White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

THE INTERNAL BATH

BY MEANS OF

"THE J. B. L. CASCADE TREATMENT"

GIVES

HEALTH, STRENGTH, VITALITY

The J. B. L. Cascade is the only appliance especially made for the successful practice of the Internal Bath. It is simple in construction, absolutely safe, invariably effective, and can be applied by any person. The fundamental principle of the internal bath and its appliance, the J. B. L. Cascade, is, roughly stated: Every disease arises from the retention of waste matter in the system—Nature's drainage being clogged. In the vast majority of cases the clogging is in the colon or large intestine. Positively the one harmless and efficient means of clearing away this waste is the internal bath given with the J. B. L. Cascade.

The statement of fact in the last sentence is deceptively simple, for there is no device or invention in medicine which, for far-reaching beneficence, for scope of usefulness to sick and well, surpasses the J. B. L. Cascade. There is room here merely to touch upon its field, the vastness of which may be suggested to you by pondering on the question: "If internal cleanliness is essential to health, how much more important is internal cleanliness?"

The internal bath is a sovereign remedy for ninety-nine per cent of all diseases. Its action prevents and relieves Appendicitis, Biliousness, Dyspepsia, Typhoid and all Malarial Diseases, Headaches, etc. The only treatment that gives immediate relief in cases of over-indulgence in eating or drinking. This wonderful treatment is in successful use by 200,000 people. It is endorsed and prescribed by eminent physicians. An abundance of letters from grateful people bear witness to its astonishing merit.

CONVINCING EVIDENCE

"The most perfect system of medical treatment that the wisdom of man has yet discovered."
BURCHAM MILLS, ALA.

REV. J. B. RICHARDSON.

"I still keep recommending the 'Cascade treatment' in my pastoral work. I consider it the greatest discovery of the closing century, bringing Joy, Beauty, and Life to so many that had almost despaired of ever again feeling the tingle of health in their bodies."
NEW PLYMOUTH, IDAHO.

REV. W. L. STRANGE.

"I am using it for bladder and kidney trouble, and it has afforded me the most wonderful relief. My satisfaction is so great that I shall do all in my power to induce others to use it."
OWENS, DE SOTO CO., FLA.

REV. J. H. HYMAN.

"I have been using the 'Cascade,' both myself and family, for about three years. I am delighted with it, but that does not express it. I shall do all I can to persuade others to use it."
TIGNALL, GA.

REV. J. H. FORTSON.

Miscellaneous Questions

R. O. F., Pawtucket, R. I. Are there any birds without wings?

In this country, no. But you can find wingless birds both in New Zealand and Australia. The best known is the Kiwi, from whose white feathers beautiful mats are made.

M. H. R., East Orange, N. J. Is it not true that novelists and playwrights very much overdraw the horrors of the deathbed?

This is a common error among writers. We have been told by doctors who have witnessed thousands of deaths, that the last moments are seldom—almost never—terrible.

I. I. N., Louisville. What is the best kind of dog for a family pet?

Just a plain mongrel, a friend who is versed in dog-lore assures us, and adds: "If you want a faithful, trustworthy dog, that's the kind to get. Dogs that hold their heads high, and want to sit on cushions and wear blue ribbons round their necks, five times out of six show their high breeding by one day snapping at the children, or taking poison the day after you have paid the veterinary surgeon's bill for curing them of one of their fashionable diseases. Now, you can't get a mongrel dog to take poison, and you can't lose him, as you can a high-bred dog that will cost you a small fortune in rewards before you know he is in league with all the bad characters in the neighborhood. A mongrel dog knows he is only allowed to live as a special privilege, and that makes him humble and faithful and very grateful for attentions."

J. S., Butte, Mont. Can you let me know whether any sea-going canoes are built in America?

They are by the Indians of British Columbia and possibly of some parts of South America. Some of the largest canoes are capable of holding a hundred people, and can be speeded through a smooth sea at the rate of 100 miles a day. They are worth from $200 to $300.

P. A., Rochester, N. Y. There has been a discussion in our family and we have decided to submit the matter to you. I maintain that it is nonsense to talk about the human eye being expressive, because whatever expression there may be about the eyes is due to the movement of the eyelids; but my family take the opposite view. Which side is right?

Oculists tell us that except for the more or less mechanical expansion and contraction of the pupil, the eye has no more expression than a glass marble. Individual expression consists in the varying movements of the lids peculiar to different people.

James B., Detroit. What was the chief cause of the early Christians' hatred for the Jews, outside of religious antagonism?

It was, undoubtedly, the profound knowledge which the Jews had acquired in the ization. Civilization in America began in Peru and not on the banks of the Mississippi; in the Old World it began beside the Nile and not on the banks of the Danube.

J. A. B., Pittsburg, Pa. Is it true that the sun is nearer the earth in winter than in summer?

Yes. But the northern hemisphere of the earth being turned from the sun in the winter, so that the sun's rays strike at an angle, instead of directly as in the summer, the winters are colder.

Mary M. C., Vassar, Mich. Please give a list of a few of the best historical books dealing with the time of Christ—just a few of the best ones. I mean books like Ben Hur, Quo Vadis and Hyphatia.

These are historical novels, and being fiction, with only a slight historical basis, they are of little value, as far as the record of events is concerned. Lytton, Ebers, Kingsley, Croly, Mrs. E. S. Phelps, Sienkiewicz, have each written stories dealing with the time of Christ. They form pleasant and stimulating reading, but they should never be confused with actual history.

Mrs. Charles H., So. Dayton, N. Y. By what authority was the Lord's Prayer changed to "trespass" instead of "debts," as recorded in the "Gospel according to St. Matthew?"

If you examine the passage in the Revised Bible, you will find that the word "trespass" is preferred by the revisers. It is a more comprehensive and expressive word.

5:6 does not imply that he had no parents, but that they were unknown, obscure people. The writer of the Epistle used the character as an illustration to show that the fact of Christ not being of the priestly tribe did not invalidate his claim to the priestly character. In the recently deciphered Tel-el-Amarna tablets, there are several letters containing curiously parallel claims on the part of a potentate, who boasts of not having inherited his kingdom from father or mother, but by the appointment of the mighty gods.

It is not only ornamental but useful, and can be had in either gilt or sterling silver. Members should specify with their orders which metal they prefer. Orders should be sent to Orrin B. Booth, General Secretary, 92 Bible House, New York.

The poem, entitled "A Modern Petition," which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 12, should have been credited to Caroline A. Walker, from whose versatile pen it was originally contributed to Life, which printed it some time ago.

H. G. A., Colo. 1. The theory that every building of harmonious proportions has its keynote is a very old one, but there is no record that it was ever practically illustrated. 2. See Job 19: 26, 27.

Mabel S., Tarrytown. It is certainly "bad form" to look at your watch during the course of a sermon. It is the same thing as saying, "Well, now, are you not nearly finished?" There is a story told of a clergyman, who, in the course of his preaching, addressed his congregation as follows: "I have noticed that two or three of the brethren have looked at their watches several times in the last few minutes. For fear their time-pieces may not agree, I will say that the correct time is 11:45. I set my watch by the regulator at the jeweler's last night. The sermon will be over at 12:01. It would have closed promptly at 12, but for this digression. Let us proceed to consider now what the apostle meant when he said, 'I press toward the mark.'"

Among the odd questions which reach us in THE MAIL-BAG this week, is one from a correspondent in South Africa, who wants to know the size of the largest honeycomb that has ever been found in America. The largest of which we can find any authentic record is one which measured thirty feet in length. It was taken from a hollow tree in the southern part of Georgia. Two swarms of bees had a hand at making it. One worked from the top of the hollow and the other from the bottom, until they met in the middle.

A COTTON-GIN IN DIXIE

The cotton gins used in the South to-day are a great improvement on the one Eli Whitney invented, but the principle is the same. In the old-time gin, while it was in full operation, the very air seemed white with flying particles; now, with the improved gin, no lint is in evidence. In fact, in many instances, the modern gin is more like a complete factory; after the fibre is cleaned, it is sent automatically into a press and baled.

study of medicine, which, above everything else, brought down upon them the hatred of the church. Not only was it thought best by the clergy of the Middle Ages to suppress all knowledge outside their own ranks, but much of their authority, and no small part of their income was derived from their trade in relics for the cure of the sick. The skill of the Jews in the healing arts was regarded as diabolical, and it was the antipathy aroused by their learning in the school of medicine which started the wave of antagonism.

R. S. A., Far Rockaway, N. Y. When did the first steamship cross the Atlantic?

The Great Western sailed from Bristol, April 8, 1838, and reached New York on the 23d. The Sirius arrived here the same day, having sailed from Liverpool on April 4.

J. A. R., Bridgeport. What part of America was the seat of the earliest civilization?

Peru. Civilization depends upon climate and agriculture. It begins in a country where the crops may be depended on. Then men, being relieved of anxiety in regard to the necessities of existence, can turn their attention to law-making, and can take the first steps toward national progress. Rainless countries are, consequently, found to be the cradle of civil-

H. M. S., St. Louis. Explain why people open their mouths in surprise or astonishment.

If our correspondent will consult Darwin, he will find the explanation given that this habit is due to a desire for quietness (it being possible to breathe without noise with the mouth open) and also to ineffectiveness of breathing. Furthermore, if he has ever studied children or baby birds, he will have noticed that at any unexpected sound or other stimulus they will open wide their mouths expecting food, and it is possible that this baby movement is unconsciously imitated under any excitement in later life.

Z. T. G., Gibson Station, Va. What is known of Melchisedec? Is there any ground for holding, as has been stated, that he was divine?

He is mentioned (Gen. 14: 18-20) as a king and a priest. The allusion is mysterious, and has never been satisfactorily explained. That Abraham recognized his eminence is obvious, but that he was divine there is no reason to believe. The reference to him in Hebrews

REV. MR. WEISS AND WIFE

DIRECTOR AND DIRECTRESS WITH NURSES AND LEPERS

BETHESDA,
SURINAM'S HOUSE

FROM GROOT CHATILLON, the Dutch Leper colony near Paramaribo, Surinam, two Moravian missionaries, Rev. Mr. Weiss and his wife, recently came in simple faith to this city to plead the cause of the afflicted ones there—such afflicted ones as our Lord when on earth turned often out of his way to heal. Exiles from their native land, they are giving their lives to the relief of Surinam's lepers, and they dwell there in a community whose members—directors, nurses and patients—are practically banished from the world.

Leprosy lurks in many corners of Surinam. Hundreds of coolies working on different estates in the interior are tainted with it, and there are many lepers of a better class living in the city of Paramaribo. It is among the latter that the gravest difficulty exists perhaps in rooting out the evil. Families do not like to have their stricken one cut off from them; the stricken one does not like to go into banishment and imprisonment. So, lepers are sheltered in prosperous homes, and the curse is thereby extended through infection. In 1897, the Dutch Government established the leper colony Groot Chatillon, and now every leper found in the open streets of the towns is arrested and compelled to live within its confines, a prisoner. A reward of twenty-five guilders is paid to any one who brings a leper for commitment. The longing to escape such fate and remain among their own people is so strong that these poor creatures rarely venture out of doors, and only in visiting homes, can any one form an idea of the real extent of the disease.

The Government Asylum contains some 150 inmates, for whom a hospital and a regular physician are provided. Across the canal is the little Protestant Leper Settlement of "Bethesda," founded in 1899, by the combined Protestant Churches in Surinam. Rev. Mr. Weiss has the spiritual oversight of both establishments; the entire colony attends the church over which he presides. Those who come to Bethesda, come of their own will, and are not held there by legal process. Many who hid in their homes avoiding commitment to the Government institution are eager for shelter here. Some are able to pay a little for their keep; others have friends who help them; some have nothing to pay. All receive kindly attention, faithful and intelligent nursing, and watchful, spiritual care. Since the pastor of the flock is director, everything is made to bend towards the end of leading the leper to accept the one hope that remains for him—eternal salvation in Jesus Christ. There are trained nurses from Germany, Deaconesses Philippina and Martha. Bethesda is a tiny village, composed of small, wooden houses of two rooms each, every leper having his or her own apartment with porch attached. There are vegetable gardens and flower plots which the colonists take pleasure in tending. The patients vie with each other in keeping their rooms tidy and inviting. By frequent changes of garments and careful the bath-house at the rear of the village, and looking within, may find Sister Martha dressing and bandaging a patient's sores while both sing a song of Zion. In one room, a young carpenter, still able to use his hands, is at work, and he, perhaps, is singing a hymn. Near a cottage entrance stands a leper girl nursing her doll. There is a summer house in the grounds where all may gather for social intercourse. At prayer-meeting those who cannot walk to worship are brought in; and the voice of song and prayer floats out upon the tropical night. At Christmas and other festival times there are pleasant surprises for everybody, and on the birthdays of patients there is always a little banquet with a birthday cake made by Mrs. Weiss, who, as the housekeeper of the great establishment, looks with motherly care after the comfort of each and all. In the afternoon, she and her husband visit the patients in the Government Asylum. Here, their work is greatly blessed, but it is more difficult than in Bethesda. The inmates feel that they are prisoners; they are of a different class of people, too,—the class who could be taken up on the street. A number are coolies, brought from India to labor in Surinam, where they contracted leprosy. They can never return to their native land, and they are bitter and give much trouble, and police force is necessary.

Typical of many instances proving how Bethesda is needed, this is told: A little girl showed her mother a strange spot on her body. The mother set her apart in an upper room, and attended her with occasional aid from an old negress. Once, the child said weeping: "What have I done so bad that I may go out doors no more, nor see my brothers and sisters again? Put me on a plantation." "I have none, my child." She exclaimed: "Mother, the negress says at Bethesda I might play out doors and have my flowers around me. Let me go." When Jennie entered the leper's church, there was nothing left of her former beauty but her long golden hair; yet none shrank from her and she was happy. She found a little playmate, to whom she left her dolls when she died. A prosperous young man the day before his wedding released his betrothed, because a tell-tale spot had appeared on his arm. He came to Bethesda, and there the lovers bade each other farewell. He is blind, and would suffer sorely if placed where he could not have kindness and care. Many lepers applying for admission to Bethesda have to be turned away; room is lacking. More cottages are needed. In America, a Protestant co-operative committee has been formed. Any contributions for the work sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be promptly acknowledged and duly forwarded.

PARENTAL SINS

PROVERBS 30: 17: "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it."

HORRIBLE is the Solomonic word-picture. The gibbet, the stenchful corpse, the skeleton protruding through the torn and mortifying flesh, the feathered gormandizers banqueting upon the carrion, the clanging, rusty chains holding aloft the putrifying mass, these are the theme of my text. It is a warning to all boys and girls, as well as to all grown men and women that filial contempt is never justifiable in God's sight. No matter what our parents may do or say, we must always respect and honor them, because they are our father and mother. If we ever allow ourselves to despise them, then we shall incur the anger of God, who, by one of the ten commandments, explicitly enjoined that parents be honored by their offspring. And with that command public opinion is fully in accord. The son, who dishonors his parents, is despised in his life, and his very memory is gibbeted by public contumely after his death. He is held up to public scorn and derision, as were the ancient robbers and state criminals, whose heads used to be stuck upon long poles and for weeks exposed to public view from the top of the arch of London Temple Bar, until at last all the flesh disappeared, and nothing remained but the bleached skulls.

But though God denounces children who despise their parents, no matter how heinous the parental sins and shortcomings may be, yet as I begin to study my text in its connection with other passages of Scripture, the more I find that many of the most common filial sins can be traced back to parental sins. Some years ago, upon the Holstein Ranch in California, three little orioles were taken from a nest and confined within a bird cage. No sooner was this done, than the mother bird appeared and tried to liberate her young. Failing in this, she flew away and brought to her incarcerated babies a sprig of the deadly larkspur. In a few minutes those three fledglings with foaming mouths lay dead in the bottom of the cage. If the mother bird could not free her young, then she preferred to kill them. How often, alas, have human parents seen their offspring in a captivity to sin to which death would have been preferable, and the saddest reflection they can have, is that this captivity is the result of the moral poison they have themselves administered. By thoughtless mistakes and culpable negligence, they may have inspired their children with a contempt for themselves which has been the beginning of an evil life, ending in spiritual death.

Avoid Partiality

I shall try this morning to enumerate some of the shortcomings and sins into which neglectful and selfish and sinful parents have fallen in their dealings with their children. I would enumerate those parental sins, because the inspired author who penned the words of my text is also the Solomon who wrote, that if consecrated, godly parents would train up a child in the way he should go, when he is grown, that matured child would not only be loyal to his earthly parents, but also to his Heavenly Father.

All parents in the first place should show their children that they have no parental favorites. They should prove that all the children, as individuals, have an equal share of a father's and a mother's love. They should convince their boys and girls alike that no one child occupies a larger area in the parental heart-cells than every other child. For when a child begins to feel that the father or mother does not care for him as much as the rest of the children that child immediately begins to despise that parental partiality. Love feeds on love. And yet there are thousands upon thousands of homes in America in which you would not have to visit more than two or three days before you could, while there, tell which was the favorite son or daughter. That child will perhaps be better dressed, as old Jacob aroused the jealousy of his other children by buying for his favorite boy, Joseph, a coat of many colors. That child will have a better room in the house than the other children. He will have more spending money. He will be allowed to do what the other children are not allowed to do. On the other hand, the child which is not the parental favorite will often be shoved into the background, or sent away to the country, as Jesse sent his youngest son, David, off to tend the sheep. It is easy enough for parents to say that they have no favorites. But the words of the lip do not always correspond with the facts of the life. At nearly every funeral of a little child which I have attended in my pastoral work, I have heard a statement like this made by the side of the white casket: "It is too bad the little one was taken. She was her father's or mother's favorite." Now before God to-day, I declare that no parent has a right to have a favorite child. No favorite: unless that child is a born idiot or an invalid, or one who should be cared for and guarded the more carefully because of his or her helplessness. The fraternal hatred existing between Esau and Jacob can be directly attributed to Isaac's favoritism for his eldest son, and Rebekah's favoritism for her younger boy. And many and many a home is broken up to-day because fathers and mothers will persist in showing preferences for one child at the expense of the affection they ought to show for their other children.

A Despised Daughter

Parental favoritism has caused many a boy or girl to be sceptical of a father's or a mother's love,—the same kind of a scepticism which, in India, a little girl had, who a few years ago, made a significant comparison to an American missionary. In India, a daughter is supposed to be of such a low order of creation that some Mohammedan priests assert that women have no souls and no hereafter. And so, one day, when this little girl was trying to describe God's love for her sex, she said: "Why, it is the smallest love in the world, if it is a love!" "How small is that?" asked the lady missionary. "Oh, very, very small." "But how small?" "Why," answered the young Indian maiden, "the love of God for us women is as small—it is as small as the love my father felt for me on the day that I was born." May God never allow you, O father and mother, to instil such a distorted idea of parental affection into any child's mind and heart, on account of favoritism for some of your children at the expense of the others. May God inspire every one of you to teach your boys and girls that each one of them has a full measure of your love. May God inspire all parents to treat all their children alike, with the exception that they should be a little gentler and more thoughtful of the child who is sick, or is crippled, like Mephibosheth, who was lame in both his feet.

Allowing the servant girls to take the place of maternal and paternal companionship, can truly be classed among parental sins. I would not for an instant either say or write one word which would wound the feelings of thousands and tens of thousands of young women, who have consecrated their lives to the noble calling of nurse-girl's work. Some of the mightiest men of the ages have testified that they would never have been what they were, but for the self-sacrificing love of their nurses, who not only rocked them to sleep when they were tired, but also started their little feet in the paths of rectitude and piety. The Earl of Shaftesbury declared that the greatest inspiration for a true religious life was instilled into him by the faithfulness of his Christian nurse. The mighty potentate, the late Alexander III, the Czar of all the Russias, honored the faithfulness and the devoted love of his nurse. Surrounded by the Grand Dukes of Russia, for three long miles he followed a-foot after the hearse which carried the mortal remains of that dear friend, through a blinding snowstorm, out to the Royal Mausoleum of St. Petersburg. And as the dying French soldier, writhing under the surgeon's knife, cried out: "Doctor, cut a little deeper, and you will see pictured upon my heart the face of the mighty Emperor," so, many of us, if we cut down into the hearts of the faithful servants who have watched over us in our childhood, could there find our own faces, because the hearts of these faithful servants beat with love for us.

Personal Attention

But though many of our household servants may be to us and to our children as the Earl of Shaftesbury's Christian nurse was to him, yet no true father or mother can afford to delegate the physical, moral and religious training of their children to servants, no matter how faithful and true those servants may be. No woman can take the place of a true mother by the side of the crib. No man can do for the boys what a consecrated father is able to do when he is faithful to the trust which God has given to him.

Oh man, studying the debit and credit sides of your ledgers, counting up your hundreds of thousands of dollars, and carefully watching the manifold details of a vast mercantile enterprise, which taxes your physical and mental energies to the utmost, you may think you have no time to examine into the details of how your thirteen-year-old son spends his weekly allowance. But you ought to take that time. On account of your parental neglect, you may live to regret the day that you were born and also the day that your son was born. Oh woman, you may think this is the age for the emancipation of your sisters. In pride you may listen to week-day lectures on woman's rights, and Shakespeare, and sculpture, and art. You may consider it a great social opportunity to be able to join a card party one afternoon, and go to a tea the next afternoon, and be the equal and the associate of the social queens of our most prominent cities. But no social nor worldly honor ought to be great enough or important enough to entice you away from your nursery, so that you must delegate the care of your children to a hired servant. Parental neglect is not in God's sight a simple misdemeanor; it is a sin.

Lack of nursery discipline can sometimes be classed among parental sins, or rather, mistakes. We would not like to call the actions of a too indulgent parent by such a harsh word as sin. Yet Solomon, who wrote the words of my text, gave the parental mistakes of overindulgence even a harder definition than that of sin. He said: "He that spareth his rod hateth his son, but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes." In other words, we have a right to make by this quotation the simple deduction, that if a father will not make a child learn to obey him, then he is very apt to let a child learn to despise him.

Injurious Leniency

I used to be very harsh in my condemnation of parents who were overindulgent and would not compel obedience upon the part of their children. But the older I grew the more lenient I became in my criticism of this evil. I have found out that the invariable reason why most parents are overlenient with their children, is because they have a family plot in which they have buried some of their little ones. It is on account of the little pale faces of the dead that they shrink from causing tears to flow over the rosy cheeks of the living.

But, fathers and mothers, though you may have buried two of your children, remember that you are not just to the living, unless you teach them the laws of filial obedience. A disobedient son invariably means a wilful, wayward, selfish, petulant, unbalanced and God-defying man. An undutiful daughter generally means a quick-tempered, sinful, ungovernable woman, who will ultimately despise and trample upon all pure love. It was because Queen Agrippina laughed at her little, wilful boy, Nero, who doubled up his tiny fists and struck at her, that she was compelled to live to see the day when the queen mother would have to bare her flesh for the fatal stroke of the royal hirelings who came to do the bidding of a murderous son. Sometimes the unkindest act that a parent can do to a child is to give to the boy or girl a sugar plum, when that child ought to have, according to the Solomonic advice, a good, sound thrashing.

Hypocrisy is the most awful of all parental sins. No matter what the father or mother may do, as long as the child can firmly believe that his parents are living consecrated, godly, pure and noble lives, that child is bound to the foot of the Cross with bands of steel. But when the child believes that his mother and father are leading hypocritical lives—pretending one thing to the world and living another kind of life at home—as a rule, there is very little temporal or spiritual hope for the child. Bad parents generally have bad children.

Sometimes, the reverse of this rule seems to be true. Good parents, also, for a while may seem to have bad children. But if you will carefully study the history of different Christian homes, you will generally, aye, I believe always, find that the children of consecrated, godly parents, who have trained them up in the way they should go, will always turn out right; while those hypocritical parents who do not train up their children rightly, will ultimately have their children turn out wrong.

The Promise Fulfilled

Good old Dr. Alexander, of Princeton College, once preached upon this text: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." He preached to prove that nearly all the sins which men and women practice, can ultimately be traced back to wrong parental training, or to the hypocrisies of parents, who have lived in the home a religion of sham. After the sermon was over, some of Dr. Alexander's friends said to him: "Professor, it is absurd for you to preach a sermon like that. If what you say is true, then you yourself have been living the wrong kind of a Christian life, or else you have not trained your children as you should have done. You know, Doctor, that your boy Dick, is one of the worst boys in all Princeton College. He is as wild as wild can be." "Oh," answered the good old Doctor, "you did not hear my text aright. My text says: 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old—' Dick is not old yet. Just wait a while, and the boy will come out all right." Dr. Alexander spoke the truth; Dick did come out all right. In a few years, he not only gave his heart to God, but he went to New York City and entered business as a Christian layman; and long after his honored father had pillowed his head in the dust, Richard Alexander, the wild Princeton student, wielded a mighty influence for God and for heaven. So, my friends, to-day, as Christian men and women, we must realize that the whole future destinies of our children are largely dependent upon us. If we live consecrated, godly lives, and train up our children in the way they should go, they will also become consecrated Christian men and women. And if we are hypocrites, and do not train them as they ought to be trained, then our children will also turn out wrong. Bad parents have bad sons and daughters. Good parents produce good children. There is hardly an exception to the rule.

Parental examples and training invariably reproduce themselves in the lives of children. There is a beautiful story told of a noted king in the far East who was about to take a journey into a remote part of his kingdom. He therefore sent ahead of him a trusted minister to build for his royal master a suitable palace where the king could lodge in the far country. When the royal courier reached the remote part of the kingdom, he found a plague raging there, and people were dying by thousands and tens of thousands. So, instead of taking the money from the royal treasury and spending it for bricks and stones and mortar, the royal messenger spent it for bread and medicine. With it he dug graves and buried the dead. With it he bought clothing to protect the living. And when the king came and found what his messenger had done, instead of punishing his minister, he commended him. He said, "Oh faithful servant, you have builded for me a palace. You builded it in the hearts of my people. You have builded its white walls out of the tombstones which you have erected over the graves of the dead. You have jeweled it with the tears you have wiped away. You have made my palace echo with the sweetest of songs; for those songs are the echoing sobs which you have stilled." So, like the king of old, who sent his messenger into the far country, God sends us forth as parents on a most important mission. By our examples and self-sacrificing love, we are to build the Palace of Purity in the hearts of our children. What we do invariably decides how our children shall live and die; it decides their eternal welfare. The influence of noble Christian parents upon the lives of their children cannot be described better by me in closing, than by telling the history of my old home, the home of my boyhood. My father and mother had a large brood, we were seven. I never knew any one of those seven children to have more indulgence than the others. Each had the full measure of a parent's love. When troubles came to that home, and many troubles did come, we always found that father and mother had a Divine strength given to them to bear those troubles. 'Way back in the dim past, long before I was born, they had set up the family altar. I was carried to that sacred altar when so young that I sometimes used to fall asleep during the prayers. My father and mother were not bound together so much by ties of law, as by unbreakable ties of love. The first question father always asked when he entered the home was: "Where is your mother?" The first question mother asked when she came home was: "Where is your father?" They were side by side at the marriage altar. They were side by side in the Christian training of their children. Hand in hand as partners, they spread two tables for their children. The one was for the sacred communion of family worship; the other was the dining-table, where we children were taught to love one another. Christ was asked to sit at both tables.

That parental influence, in the home of my childhood, was a blessed one. In my college days, I used to cherish the hope that that influence might be continued in my own home, by the earthly presence of my father and mother, who I hoped would pass the twilight of their lives by my own fireside. But God willed it otherwise. On August 5, 1895, the death angel came to summon one of that living twain. On April 12, 1902, the same messenger came and called the other. They have passed into the glorious Presence where duty well done receives its reward. To me is left only the hallowed memory of their wise and tender training, which will remain with me an influence and an example to the end of my life. By my own experience, I commend to you, O fathers and mothers, this duty of parental care and solicitude. May God help you to perform it so efficiently that when you pass from earth into the glories of heaven, your children may rise up to call you blessed! May God answer this prayer of an anxious father, to keep us one and all from committing the parental sins which everywhere beset us, and which so easily may destroy us, and, to our unending sorrow, jeopardize the eternal welfare of our loving, trustful children!

NEW FACES at the NATION'S CAPITAL

THE growth of our diplomatic service has been continuous throughout the last century, but it is only within recent years that it has reached its present position of importance. Until 1893, Washington was a mission of second-class standing, and a minister plenipotentiary its highest official. In that year, Great Britain made the overture and invited our government to raise the rank of its representative at the Queen's Court. This invitation was accepted, and soon afterward Great Britain, France and Italy made their missions at Washington ambassadorial in rank. Since then, Germany, Russia and Mexico have followed suit, and Austria-Hungary is now considering a similar step.

Beside these seven embassies, there are twenty-nine foreign legations in Washington which are under the jurisdiction of ministers plenipotentiary, or temporarily in the care of a charge d'affaires. Each legation is filled with a large secretarial force, but the personnel of the corps undergoes such constant change that scarcely a winter passes which does not bring in many new faces among its members. An unusual number of these changes have occurred this year. By the death, last spring, of Great Britain's envoy, Lord Pauncefoot, "the dean of the corps," Doctor von Hollenben, the German plenipotentiary, became dean. According to the rules of diplomatic precedence, Germany now ranks first at the Department of State, and her ambassador is deferred to on every occasion. He will take the initiative in advising his colleagues in time of peace or war; he will be given the place of honor at state dinners, and will be the first of the corps to be presented to President Roosevelt at the New Year's reception and other official functions at the White House. Although Doctor von Hollenben is a bachelor, he does not allow that fact to interfere in the least with his duties as host. He is a generous entertainer. He sometimes invites the wife of his brother diplomatist to assist him in receiving his dinner reception guests, but more often Countess Quadt, the wife of the counsellor of the mission, takes upon her young shoulders the duties of hostess of embassy.

The changes which have recently occurred have shifted the Russian mission from near the foot of the line, where it has stood for the past three years, up to second place, while the Mexican embassy, from ranking at the very foot, now stands next to the Russian. There has been but little alteration in these two diplomatic homes. Count Cassini and his accomplished adopted daughter still dispense the hospitality of the Czar's legation, and Senor and Senora de Azpiroz continue as the hosts of the Mexican deputation. Signor Mayor des Planches, the present Italian ambassador, when he came to Washington last winter, persuaded his government to buy legation property. Mrs. Hearst's palatial home, on New Hampshire avenue, was selected, and the new ambassador and his charming wife have already made it one of the most popular of the diplomatic homes.

Last June Sir Michael Henry Herbert was named as Lord Pauncefoot's successor at the head of the British embassy, and with Lady Herbert and one of their sons arrived in this country the first week in October. Sir Michael was knighted by King Edward last June, during the coronation celebrations. He is also a Knight Commander of Saint Michael and Saint George, and a Companion of the Bath. The new ambassador and Lady Herbert have two children, both sons. The elder remained in England, where he is studying to prepare himself to enter Oxford. He was one of King Edward's pages at the coronation last June.

As M. Jusserand, who was appointed to succeed M. Cambon in August, in the French embassy, does not come to this country to present his credentials to President Roosevelt until the very last of the year, the French embassy will rank at the foot of the ambassadorial line until another change brings a later addition to it. M. Jusserand, though a comparatively young man, has already won a distinguished name both in diplomatic and literary circles. He was born in Lyons in 1855, and was educated in the schools of that city and Paris. He began his diplomatic career as Director of Consulates in the French Cabinet in 1876. His literary career began soon after entering the service. He has written a Literary History of the English People, which is widely read both in England and France. He has also written and published many other books. Mme. Jusserand is an American by birth. Before her marriage she was Miss Elsa Richards, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George T. Richards, of New York.

Sir Chentung Liang Cheng, the new Chinese envoy, made a brief visit to the United States while en route with Prince Chen, when the latter was making a tour of this country last summer; but he will not come to Washington to take permanent possession of his new post before the last of the year. Sir Cheng received the greater part of his education at Andover and Amherst.

Visconde de Alte, the new Portuguese representative, is a scholarly young bachelor, and has taken apartments at a fashionable uptown hostelry for the winter. Senor Don Emilio de Ojeda, the new Spanish minister, comes from a distinguished family. His father was chamberlain to Queen Isabella and an influential statesman. Senor de Ojeda has served at a number of posts in Europe, the Orient, and South America.

In their religious beliefs, the diplomats and their families at Washington are usually adherents of their State church at home. Thus, Doctor von Hollenben is a Lutheran, and with his entire staff attends the Thomas Circle Church of that faith; Sir Michael and Lady Herbert are members of the church of England; the Russian ambassador and suite are members of the Greek Church; the French and Italian ambassadors, with the majority of the other plenipotentiaries from Europe, as well as those from the Central and South American Republics, are Roman Catholics. The members of the Oriental legations each cling to their own religious customs, and although they occasionally attend the various churches of the city, it is very rare that any one of them ever publicly identifies himself with a Christian church.

THE MAD MULLAH'S WAR

In the intervals of peace, they are purely a pastoral people; the pasturing of the female camels and flocks is their only occupation.

To rob and to be robbed is part of the daily life of the Somali. Indeed, the chief work of the men, when not conducting a raid, is the protection of their flocks from looting; all other duties fall to the share of the women and children while the men keep watch, sitting in the shade of the trees, with only one subject for thought, conversation and song—that of their own exploits as robbers, retrospective and prospective.

The Somali are a volatile and song-loving people, and though they sing of looting, it has to them a romantic meaning, for, as often as not, it is by looting that they win their wives from the neighboring tribes.

The villages of the Somali are as easily moved as a camp of tents. There is nothing permanent about them. The huts are made of bent boughs, covered with skins and mats. These mats, which are cleverly constructed of grass and bark, form the saddles of the camels when the tribes are migrating. The women

These people are extremely superstitious; they believe absolutely in the efficacy of charms, and the warriors generally wear an amulet in the form of a verse of the Koran strapped to their arms or hung round their necks.

The property and relative standing of a tribe is measured by the number of ponies they possess—for on these depends their success in looting forays, escape from pursuit, and the possibility of recovering the camels which have been stolen by neighboring tribes.

They regard murder as a sport. As you journey through the desert, you perceive a number of stone altars surrounded by upright slabs, like milestones, some of which are surmounted by lumps of quartz.

They are the tombs of Somali braves, each slab recording a murder, and the quartz intimating that the man had been killed with his steed.

The desert is the chief feature of the country.

"You are in a sea of gray," says Mr. Vivian, who has recently returned from travels in Abyssinia and Somali land. "The fierce sun beats down upon you from a blue-gray sky; as you pass, gray shrubs nod at you in apoplectic grimness, and livid gray lizards shiver away over the gray sand; gray jackals eye you suspiciously from behind huge gray ant-hills; gray bones and skulls strew the beaten track."

But the traveler passes through every kind of scenery. Now forests watered by perennial streams, lined with great trees, festooned with creepers; now through vast areas covered with the high, green elephant grass of the jungle; now low-lying hills, presenting a park-like appearance, with their open glades and grassy plains; now towering and rugged mountains.

Such is the country in which the small British force is faced by the wild spearmen of the great Mad Mullah.

The Company of the Great

Within a book I met the wise and great,
The kindly and the true,
And as I studied each, I said to fate,
"Like these, my best I'll do."

Great men and women set like patterns before our eyes help us to be great. It is understood that corrupt literature debases the nature, and that there is peril for the young in examples brought before them in dime novels. If this is true—and who doubts it?—does it not prove that there is power to uplift in good literature, and that boys and girls may develop the qualities of great men and women when they read of these? If your girl were learning how to cut her dresses, you would be careful to put the best patterns before her. If your boy were making a chair or a table, you would want him to have perfect models. How about setting the best patterns and models before the young as they are shaping their characters and their lives? There will be far-reaching good to every boy and girl, young man and maiden, in reading The Hall of Fame, our beautiful premium book, in which only great men and women have a place. The middle-aged and the gray-haired ones will find pleasure and comfort in having this noble company ever with them. The book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

MOHAMMEDAN and Christian are at war in Somaliland, the great eastern horn of Africa. The Mad Mullah, with 20,000 followers, is face to face with a small British force, which sustained a severe reverse on or about October 6, though not without inflicting considerable loss on the enemy. Ever since the recent fighting, the Mad Mullah has maintained a force only one march distant from the British force. Somali spies report the presence of a large caravan of rifles, under the guidance of a European, making its way through the country to join the Mullah. Meanwhile, the British reinforcements, which have arrived from India, are being hurried to the front. The difficulties attending the collection of transport and the making of commissariat arrangements are causing delay in the advance, as it is impossible to rely upon local supplies for food or transport. The country is without resources.

It was in 1884 that Great Britain formed a protectorate of 68,000 square miles on the coast of Somaliland. The natives are on the whole friendly, but they are easily persuaded to flock to the standard of the Mullah, and the danger of a second British reverse lies in its widespread possibilities, owing to the close inter-relationship of Moslem feeling and fanaticism in North Africa.

The so-called "Mad Mullah," who is as sane as most, and a good deal more clever, has made spasmodic appearances in East African politics during the last three years. The son of a herdsman, he was trained as a "mullah," or religious teacher; made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and gained great repute as a holy man. From Mecca, he passed to Aden, where he stirred up popular feeling by his preaching, and was finally expelled by the authorities. Returning to Somaliland, he instituted a "jihad," or "holy war," against the infidels. A year ago it was thought that his power had been broken by the British expedition, but last winter he recovered his prestige. He is without doubt the most interesting personage in Africa to-day. Cruel, cunning, and full of fanaticism, he constitutes the greatest menace to trade and civilization throughout the northeast of the Dark Continent.

The Somalis are a nomadic race, and claim to be descended from fugitive Arabs. Save for the deep darkness of their skin and the scantiness of their raiment, they might pass for Europeans of some refinement. The inhabitants of Somaliland are made up of a number of independent tribes, governed by Sultans or minor chiefs. They have no settled homes, each tribe wandering about, within more or less defined boundaries, as pasture, water or rain may lead them. The only approach to settled villages are the occasional clusters of mud-huts, known as mullah settlements, where some priest resides, and a few children are taught the Koran in the precincts of some saint's tomb. The Koran is the law, civil and commercial, of these people, and regulates their social conditions. Their political institutions are few, and their social life simple.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE ENEMY SIGNALING BY LIGHT OF THE SUN WATER HOLE IN THE DESERT

undertake the work of putting up and taking down the huts, and it also falls to their share to make the mats. Often you may see the women standing under the trees with a long strip of bark going in one corner of their mouths to be chewed, and coming out of the other in fibre ready for plaiting.

The Somali possess the unusual combination of vanity and pride. A colored flannel coat, with bright buttons, makes a peacock of the best, yet he never loses his dignity. They pay the closest attention to their personal appearance, being constantly occupied in cleaning and polishing their beautiful teeth with little sticks.

Nowhere in the world can you meet human beings so sensitive to blame or sneer. Theirs is a very high-strung nature. But the Somali are not effeminate. On the contrary, they are born fighters and marchers. Their powers of going long distances without water and with little food are really remarkable. When supplied with modern weapons, they soon become excellent marksmen, and the Mullah is known to have obtained a large supply of rifles. Curiously enough, the Somali are hopeless cowards about facing a remote danger. But when a sudden emergency arises, they show plenty of spirit. Like the Irish, they are always looking for the chance to fight; in lieu of shillelaghs, they always carry their spears.

It is the custom of the Somali when on the eve of a dangerous enterprise, to spend their night in prayer and singing religious hymns or songs.

The Learned Men of the Ghetto

By A. H. FROMENSON

IT is not so easy to know and understand the learned old man of the Ghetto. He is a tradition, he is a monument, he is an inheritance. He speaks and stands for the past. He is a living reminder of a fought and endured, but never yielded;

as conditions became worse—as gradually all the avenues of commerce, all the opportunities of endeavor became closed to him. More and more the Beth Hamidrash (House of Learning) became his social centre, his theatre, his club, his militant Judaism that thrived and suffered and that trafficked and bartered on the highways of commerce; that carved out new roads for civilization to tread; that gave the impetus to agriculture and to transportation; that set the wheels of industry a-spinning; that enjoyed luxury and spread happiness on all sides, and that on a sudden was driven out of the market-place, off the highways, was forbidden to till the soil or to deal in the products of the farm, and denied the right to give employment to willing labor; that was hurled back into the abyss—the Ghetto, the Pales, the Judengasse!

In vain his devotion to his Fatherland; in vain his participation in all its struggles, its defeats, its triumphs. The record of his achievements in peace and in war, his industrial and commercial accomplishments and triumphs counted for naught against unreasonable religious prejudice and race-hatred, or mistaken paternalism, or mad Chauvinism. Back to the old depressing, crushing conditions—the proscribed quarters, the yellow cap or badge; back to the shacher-macher, the pfenig or copeck business; once more a luft mensch, waiting hour by hour and day by day for something, anything to turn up, with a heart filled with longing for the "good times" that were gone, never, perhaps, to return. From luxury to want; from activity, strenuousness, to idleness, hopelessness, listlessness; from rank and station and honor, to the dust!

Time, but just now all too short, hung heavy, and to forget for a moment the horror of the new conditions, to save the heart from breaking over the glories that had passed, the victims of the cruelty of discriminating laws turned to the synagogue or private library. The ponderous tomes, the printed Talmud, with its commentaries and commentaries upon commentaries, brought nepenthe, surcease from sorrow, and the old-time merchant, the former manufacturer, the erstwhile contractor, who had glanced over those pages cursorily, on the Sabbath afternoon, now became a deep student of the spirit and the letter of this great cyclopedia and interpreter of the law.

Where formerly an hour's brooding and thumbing of the leaves sufficed, now the old rule that "ye shall study all thy days and all thy nights" came into force, because there was nothing else to do. More and more assiduous he became in these studies exchange, his social world, his bulwark, his fortress against the invasion of mental inanition, atrophy and decay. He found in this study mental and moral salvation. It saved him from degradation to gutter, it saved him and his line for posterity.

Limited to the Talmudic literature, too, too meagre for his intellectual needs, he became a veritable bookworm, obtaining so complete a knowledge of the contents thereof, that his casual talk, his social converse was ornamented and illuminated with phrases and passages from this literature; more than that, his acquaintance with the printed pages was rendered so intimate that he could at will cite passages, giving the chapter, page and line. He knew his Gemorah (Talmud and commentaries) as intimately as his rabbi, unless, indeed, he had been of a low order of mentality at the beginning, if he was not a tailor, a cobbler or a tinker. The rabbi, to hold his rank, to maintain his authority, must needs be remarkably well versed in this literature—or run the gauntlet of criticism, contradiction. Among those erudite men of the Ghetto are some who rebel against acceptance of the printed Talmudic page. These recalled that Elijah of Wilna, greatest rabbi and greatest student of his time, crowned with the title "Gaon," discovered errata on the printed page. For these, the "higher criticism" dawned, and this led by easy stages to a study of the one-time forbidden, confiscated and incinerated works of Solomon Maimon, the Polish-Jewish philosopher and critic, and from Maimon to Moses Mendelssohn was but a step. From Mendelssohn they imbibed the spirit of broad religious tolerance and enlightenment and thought freedom. From Lessing these erstwhile Talmudists learned aesthetics and the history of philosophy. To-day, the Ghetto of New York, and every Ghetto in Europe and America, contains men who are acquainted with every school of philosophy, ancient, medieval and modern, who know and understand the Aristotelian and the Platonic view, and who follow the guidance of Spinoza, Leibnitz, Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schleiermacher and Schopenhauer, though they are not averse to tempering and blending the teachings of these thinkers with the lessons of the Sages and the Rabbins. Some there were who followed these new researches at such a pell-mell speed that they

An International Disgrace

IN the long record of crimes against womanhood, it would be hard to find a parallel to the flagrant villainies of the international band of offenders, whose monstrous doings were last week disclosed by the German Ambassador to the Philadelphia police. According to the story—which bears every evidence of reliability—a syndicate, with headquarters in Halle, Germany, and branches in Chicago, Philadelphia and New York, has been engaged in the systematic decoying of young girls from European cities, who were lured to Halle, shipped to Philadelphia and New York, and there turned over to private parties for a money consideration. They were to all intents and purposes, slaves, and the slavery to which they were doomed was worse than death; it was the slavery of shame! Evidence was produced to show that the victims of this nefarious traffic were girls of Jewish, French, Italian and other nationalities, some even being from South Africa. They were sold here like cattle at the shambles, but for less money, the price paid ranging from five to ten dollars apiece. In their slave pens, they were kept like captive wild animals, watched and fed, and subjected to nameless indignities.

It is utterly useless, and wicked besides, through any false sense of modesty, to keep silent in a case of this character. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will not "draw a veil" over a crime by which not only the whole community, but all humanity is outraged. This is a case where every right-thinking citizen, and especially every Christian head of a family, should "cry aloud and spare not," until the law has within its grasp everyone of the inhuman wretches who have been making merchandise of these poor, simple, deluded creatures, and who have led them to physical, and doubtless in many cases, to spiritual destruction. Bold in the success of their wickedness, they have profited by the ruin of hundreds of young, innocent girls, and have brought misery and shame upon all the relatives of their victims as well.

We trust that the police of all three cities will succeed in running these precious scoundrels to earth, and that they will soon be in the hands of the law. Something less than a year ago, the New York authorities succeeded in breaking up the infamous "cadet" system. Here is a system, international in scope, and doubtless backed by money and influence. It remains to be seen whether the German and American detectives are not together equal to the task of bringing the criminals to justice. It should be done, and that quickly.

Denominational Co-operation

CHEERING news is received of the progress of the movement for the federation of churches. Dr. E. B. Sanford, the Secretary of the National Federation, reports that during his recent tour in the West, the idea has been enthusiastically received and its advantages recognized. Dr. Barton, one of the Secretaries of the American Board of Missions, who has just returned from a tour of the foreign fields, says that the missionaries are impelled by the same spirit and are in advance of the home churches in fraternal co-operation, and are working in harmony for the promotion of the Kingdom of Christ, without regard to denominational differences. In England, Canada and Australia the same amity prevails and organization has been perfected.

The chief difficulty still to be surmounted among ourselves is the misunderstanding still prevalent of the object contemplated by the advocates of federation. An impression is abroad that it implies the surrender by the denominations of the distinctive principles for which they stand and for which their founders and advocates have contended and suffered. If this were so, there would be little prospect of its succeeding. Those principles are dear and will not be abandoned. The real object of federation is co-operation. On the principles of righteousness and justice and honesty, the churches are all in accord. They have not the weight and influence that properly belongs to them, because they have no means of united action. It is this that federation offers. If any legislation inimical to Christianity is proposed in any State, the churches, acting together, could speak in protest with a voice that would compel attention. Federation also prevents a duplication of evangelistic effort and provides means for reaching outlying spheres of labor. Representatives of all the denominations in a city, conferring together, could arrange for aggressive work in needy districts; they could plan for united efforts in philanthropy and social reform; their representatives on the State Federation could wield a strong influence on the legislatures; and the National Federation, uttering the voice of millions of Christians throughout the country, could exert a power that would tend to national righteousness.

Christ's prayer that "they all may be one," is brought perceptibly nearer by this movement. It does not propose to blend the churches in communion or organization; it does not propose the creation of an authoritative controlling power, but it does seek to supply the means of co-operation in matters which are common concern to all denominations. As Dr. Behrends said in the inception of the movement: "It does not remove denominational barriers, but it lowers them sufficiently to allow a Christian of one denomination to shake hands with another on the other side of the fence."

The Fear of Death

PERHAPS it is not often well or effective to appeal to the danger of sudden death, as a reason why men should not delay to seek the Lord, and should provide the oil of grace against his midnight coming; partly, because death is not the grand occasion for which the salvation of the Lord is provided—it would be wanted, indispensable, if we did not have to die, to bring us into harmony with God, into peace with ourselves, into the rest and joy which are only possible when sin in us has been destroyed; but partly, also, because such appeals make slight impression upon men. They are not easily made to realize the nearness of death, to think of it in connection with themselves. They even sometimes trifle and mock at it, and seem to defy it.

When Walter Savage Landor thought himself on the brink of the grave, he said, "What a pity Death should have made two bites at a cherry. He seems to grin at me for saying so, and to shake in my face as much of a fist as belongs to him. But he knows I never cared a fig for his menaces, and am quite ready to let him have his own way." And irreverent trifling as it was, Landor was sincere. He was disgusted with life, which his own lawless actions had made thorny and vexatious, but, alas, he had not fitness for Death, whom he invited. A scholar, a wit, a genius, but he knew nothing of spiritual religion. He did not fear to die, because he was physically brave, and spiritually blind.

So it is often with the ungodly; they are in no dread of death while they live, and even lie down and die calmly. But none the less their fearless leap into eternity involves a terrible waking. Oh, that men would be wise with the wisdom that will never have to cry "Our lamps are going out!"

A Historical Reconciliation

AMONG the cable messages that were flashed across the Atlantic last week was one which, though it does not seem to have been considered worthy of even a paragraph of comment by the newspapers, was yet full of the most significant historical interest. It was the announcement that Ibrahim Khan Dovleti had been appointed Persian ambassador to the Court at Athens.

To rightly comprehend the significance of this news, one must turn back the pages of history to the year 491 B.C. Greece was then a world-power, though it had not yet reached the zenith of its fame and national glory. It had bravely struggled against the Persians, first under Cyrus the elder, and then under Darius, and the latter had sworn to subdue it. Every day, a slave reminded him of his oath, saying in his presence, "O King, remember the Athenians!" At last, Darius had his army and his fleet in readiness. As a preliminary step, he sent heralds into Greece, demanding of the principal cities that they deliver to him earth and water, in token of submission. Some cities yielded, but Athens and Sparta sent refusal and defiance. Darius withdrew his envoys, gave the command, and six hundred stately Persian galleys, with 120,000 men sailed for Greece. Then followed that series of splendid victories, which are still the glory of Greece and the admiration of the world, victories in which Miltiades, Themistocles, Aristides, Callimachus and other heroes immortalized themselves by deeds the poets have sung for ages. How the Persians fared at Thermopylae, at Salamis, at Plataea, all the world knows. Those were the days of the invincible "Pyrrhic phalanx"—martial prototype of the irresistible football "wedge"—which the degenerate Greeks of to-day have forgotten. They were history-making days, too, for we question seriously whether our own Farragut or Dewey would have undertaken the astounding task so cheerfully assumed by Cimon, the Greek admiral and son of Miltiades, who having defeated a Persian fleet of two hundred ships—sinking one hundred of them—landed his troops, flushed with victory, and routed offhand a vastly superior Persian army.

Since those events, Persia has had what is known in diplomatic circles as somewhat "strained relations" with little Greece. The little unpleasantness has lasted over twenty-three centuries! In the interval, the world has witnessed the mightiest changes. Races, empires, dominions, civilization have risen and disappeared. The Star which shone out over Bethlehem has lighted all the world. Greece and Persia have shrunk to the position of third-rate powers, the one subject to the whimsicalities of the Sultan, the other pretty much under the thumb of Russia. But the world moves, and everybody—especially the young folks, who know so much more about ancient history than ourselves—will be glad to know that those ancient foes—once terrible fire-eaters in their way, but now quite senile and harmless—are very good friends again.

Among the Workers

—SUPT. E. A. VAIL, of the Union Gospel Mission, New Orleans, wishes to thank the readers of this journal for the generous help they have extended to the mission.

—DR. F. E. SMILEY and Prof. J. L. McKinsey have lately closed a series of successful meetings at Kearney, Neb. A house-to-house canvass helped the work greatly. The evangelists afterward went to Princeville, Ill., and will then labor at Villisca, Ia.

—REV. E. O. GUERRANT, of the Soul-Winners Society (whose field of work includes Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina), has received many letters on the subject of Gen. O. O. Howard's recent Gospel tour of the Cumberlandlands. All who are interested in the work, should address Mr. Guerrant at Wilmore, Ky.

A Lovely Face

Each separate picture in our "Family Art Gallery" is a rich possession in itself. One oval in the set—a beautiful girlish head—alone would brighten a room. The pure, tender eyes, the sweet, red mouth, the shining brown tresses, make up a vision pleasant to have ever at one's elbow. It is a face that grows upon you; a face that comforts and cheers. An aged visitor at this office exclaimed, on seeing the picture in our Art Department: "I must have that face where I can see it when I wake in the morning." Another said: "My daughter is coming home from school Christmas, and I'm going to have that picture hanging in her room to greet her." Her companion said: "And I am going to do the same thing for my boy. It is the sort of girl-face I want him to like. He has a poster I don't like, and I'm going to ask him to accept this in its place. The poster-girl is bold-looking and this is so modest and sweet. And I'm going to give him the 'Horse Fair,' Bonheur's masterpiece. I know he'll like that." There is among the ten handsome pictures in our "Family Art Gallery" one that will please the taste of each member of the household, from the child at the mother's knee to the aged grandmother or grandsire. The entire set is an absolutely free gift to every subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

We have received many letters from subscribers whose subscriptions do not expire until after the beginning of the new year, inquiring how they can get possession of the Family Art Gallery and other premiums in time to use them for the Christmas holidays. In response to these inquiries, we would say that subscriptions expiring during the year 1903 may be RENEWED AT THE PRESENT TIME without any loss to the subscriber, as the date is extended for a full year from the date on which the subscription expires. On receipt of such renewal, we will immediately forward the selected premiums.

THE CABLE LANDING AT FIJI

Earth-Girdling Wires

ALMOST simultaneously with the news that arrangements have been made with the Commercial Pacific Cable Company for an All-American Cable to the Philippines, comes the report of an All-British line around the world being in actual operation. This line has been laid in sections, and by the junction of two of these sections in Fiji, the line has been completed. It now goes completely around the world, its land stations being, in every instance, on British territory. As the map on this page shows, starting from Great Britain, it passes to Gibraltar, thence under the Mediterranean, the Suez Canal and the Red Sea, it reaches Bombay; thence crossing India, it passes to Australia. Returning, it goes to Auckland, New Zealand, thence to Fiji and the Fanning Islands, thence to Vancouver, across Canada, and so by one of the existing lines back to Great Britain. An experimental dispatch sent around the world by this route, completed the circuit in one hour. The longest submarine stretch of cable is from the Fanning Islands to Vancouver, 3,237 miles. The total distance from Australia to Vancouver, which is the new section, is 7,267 miles, or, by actual measure of cable, allowing for inequalities in the submarine surface, 9,272 miles. The total cost is ten million dollars, a sum borne in various proportions by Great Britain, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. Great Britain has thus linked her vast empire together, and is now assured of communication, whether in peace or war, with its dependencies, independent of foreign interference. In no instance, does the cable touch soil belonging to another nation. Formerly, communication could be had only by a line running over the West coast of Africa, and passing through territory belonging to many different nationalities. The cable now completed was, therefore, a measure of prudence. If Great Britain became involved in war with any of those governments the telegraph wires might be cut, and so the mother country would have lost the means of telegraphic communication with her colonies. Happily, no such danger can ever menace the communication between the Christian and his Heavenly King.

I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor principalities, nor powers, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus (Rom. 8: 39).

A Disputed Boundary

A Canadian mine owner in British Columbia has called the attention of his government to a curious mistake that he insists has been made by an officer of the United States. He accompanied the officer on an expedition, which he recently made to discover the boundary marks set up by the Russians in Alaska. The officer found a series of mounds with stones set upon them on the Canadian side of the line. The officer carefully examined the marks on the stones, and, though not able to decipher them, claimed that they were Russian boundary stones. If his contention was right, the United States are entitled to a considerable area that has hitherto been regarded as belonging to Canada. The mine owner, however, insists that the stones are not boundary marks at all, but are grave-stones, set up by the Indians to mark the places where members of their tribes are interred. One would have thought it was easy to distinguish a grave-stone from a boundary mark. True, a grave-stone is in a sense a boundary-mark, inasmuch as it indicates the resting-place of one who has passed from one world to another; but it cannot indicate where one dominion ends and another begins, for the same dominion is on both sides of the grave, and every man at death remains subject to the power he has served during his life.

He that is unjust let him be unjust still; and he that is, righteous let him be righteous still (Rev. 22: 11).

Bible Pages Sought

An advertisement in the daily journals of New York offers a large reward for the recovery of a few pages which have been cut from an old family Bible. The book was brought to America from Holland by a family named Haughwout, in the year 1660. It was an old book even then, and was treasured by the pious family not only for its intrinsic value, but because it contained the record of births, marriages and deaths of their ancestors. The record was continued, and has been brought down to date. A short time ago two men called on the present representatives of the family, and asked permission to copy the family record as an aid to them in establishing their claim to certain property. Their request was granted, and the Bible was returned with thanks. No examination was made of it by the owners on its return, but the first time afterwards that there was occasion to consult the record, it was found that the pages had been cut out. The family has no copy of the record, and, it being exceedingly important to them to have the original, now offers a reward for its recovery. It may be hoped the missing pages will soon be found. If they are not, it may be difficult for some persons to prove that they belong to the family. Happily no such loss can imperil the standing of any member of Christ's family.

Rejoice because your names are written in heaven (Luke 10: 20).

Seeking Longer Life

The experiments conducted by Professor Jacques Loeb at the University of Chicago to discover the basis of life, have reached an advanced stage. In a recent lecture he informed his students that, with the aid of Professor Edward P. Lyons, of the same university, means had been found of prolonging the life of dying mammals. Proceeding on the line of investigation begun some time ago, by which the discovery was made of imparting new life to turtles after death had apparently occurred, experiments were made on mice, dogs and cats. After life had become totally extinct and all action of the heart had ceased, an injection was made into their veins of the mixture devised by the professor. It is composed of sodium and calcium in definite proportions. Almost instantly the physical functions were resumed, and for a period of varying length in different animals and with different solutions, the heart-beats were maintained with normal rhythm and strength. The professor believes that by further study and experiment he will yet find how to renew life in the human form when, through injury or exhausted vitality, it is on the verge of extinction. How many there are who will anxiously await the result of the professor's effort to discover the secret of renewing life, which has evaded the search of scholars from the earliest times! Yet how few there are who accept the free offer of everlasting life which Christ makes to all who will come to him!

Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life (John 5: 40).

Traffic Stopped by a Bird

A singular accident is reported from Utica, N. Y. A few days ago, a large blue heron alighted on a wire carrying power from the Trenton Falls station to one of the local sub-stations of the Utica and Mohawk Valley Railroad Company, and shortly thereafter the bird's bill came in contact with another wire. Immediately the current was cross-circuited, the fuses at the sub-power station burned out, the wires broke, the power stopped, and the 22,000 volts that the wires carried wrought havoc with the city. Scores of trolley cars on the city and suburban lines were stalled, and for five hours, or until the cause of the mischief was discovered and the damage repaired, all electric traffic in the Mohawk Valley was suspended. The trolley company sustained considerable loss as a result of the bird's prank. Like so much of the mischief that is done in this world, there was no malicious intent. The poor bird was all unconscious that by its act it was sacrificing its own life and causing loss to human beings. So it is with unenlightened men whose misery and crime are the result of their ignorance. The plea that they know no better, does not avail to save them or the victims of their heedlessness, from the consequences of their acts.

Where there is no vision the people perish (Prov. 29: 18).

BRIEF NOTES

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favour on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

M. Gaston Pollonais, the Jewish editor of the Gauleis, the influential French journal, was baptized recently on professing the Christian faith.

From various sources, we learn that there is a great demand in Puerto Rico and some of our other colonial possessions for small, convenient editions of the Gospels in Spanish and English. We have the opportunity to procure the Gospel of St. John and Gospel Hymns at absolute cost, in lots of 20 for $1 (Spanish-English edition). Any friends who desire to aid the work of the missionaries in our new colonies, can do so by sending out a package of these Gospels. When forwarding your order to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, designate the missionary to whom you desire the Gospels to be sent, or, if preferred, we will select the missionary, and send you his name and address after the books have been forwarded.

Gen. O. O. Howard writes "The 'Lincoln Memorial' (our group of schools at Cumberland Gap), is well on the road to a fair endowment of $200,000. Since Gen. Swayne's letter saw the light, our friends have subscribed $14,000 towards it. Just before that, a large mine-owner in Arizona and Mexico has promised us to subscribe $100,000. With what we have invested, I now count up in cash and promises, $168,000. But, dear HERALD readers, if we do not get the remainder of the $200,000 before January 1, 1903, we will lose our contingent promises, viz., $100,000. We need just $32,000 to secure our endowment. Send the money to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and our friends there will transmit it to our treasurer, the Hon. Darwin R. James, 123 Maiden Lane, New York."

Giving the Whole Life to God THE BOY SAMUEL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC. 14
I. SAM. 3: 6-14

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—I. SAM. 3: 9:
"SPEAK, LORD, FOR THY SERVANT HEARETH."

A PURITAN FAMILY

It is now considered quite the thing for a mother to make a "life book" for a child. Into such a book is put the date of the child's birth, and a brief description of his ancestry. Usually the collection of photographs begins with one taken at three months of age, and at frequent intervals others follow. In the life book, the leading events of a child's life are recorded, as when he began to go to Sunday School, day school, etc. Also his "cute" sayings are written out. How interesting and instructive must such a volume be to one when he reaches maturity, and is himself a student of child nature! In a most scientific manner, Herr W. Preyer observed and kept records of his own child during the first forty months of its life, and the result is two remarkable books, edited by Hon. Wm. T. Harris, U. S. Commissioner of Education: Mental Development in the Child and the Infant Mind. This phase of child study is called "psychogenesis," the beginnings of mind. It is well, more than this, it is incumbent on parents and teachers that they should study the unfolding of a child in order that they may work together with God for the best good of the child.

We are to consider the childhood of Samuel. Let us try to picture the scenes and events that belong in his "life book." First, there is a wife, Hannah, who sorrows because she is childless, and there is a kind husband, Elkanah, who asks his wife if he is not more to her than ten sons. Next we see a praying woman in the house of the Lord. She prays that God will give her a little son, and she promises that she will bring him up to serve the Lord all the days of his life. She prays with such vehemence that Eli, the high priest, mistakes her for a drunken woman. She remonstrates with him when he accuses her of being drunk, and causes him to understand her desire. Then he joins his prayer with hers, and gives her his blessing, and bids her depart to her home to wait for the coming of the child. And it is told "that the Lord remembered her." And when her little one was born she called him "Samuel," which means "Heard of God."

In the next scene Elkanah and Hannah are going up to the house of the Lord, the Tabernacle, which is at Shiloh, a distance of thirteen miles from their home in Ramah. They take their little Samuel with them. He is three years old, and only just weaned, according to the custom of Hebrew mothers. He probably rides upon an ass, with his mother, for his little feet are too tender to walk the long distance. The parents are going up to offer the yearly sacrifice, but more than this, they take their child that they may present him to the Lord in fulfillment of their vow.

In the next scene, the consecration service is held; the child is given over to the keeping of Eli, to be reared in the Tabernacle as a servant of God. The heart of the mother is glad in this sacrifice, and she gives utterance to a song of praise as worthy to be called a "Magnificat" as the song of Mary. After this, we see the little child priest, growing in wisdom and stature in the house of the Lord, doing such errands as a child may for an aged man like Eli. We see the little fellow learning to open and shut the doors of God's house, and to trim the lamps of the golden candlestick. We would enter into the joy of the yearly visit of the parents, when the mother brought him a little coat which she had wrought with her own hands, each year a little larger than the one before.

We see him next at twelve years of age so developed spiritually and mentally, that the Lord expects him to listen and understand and obey when he speaks directly to him. He is sleeping conveniently near to old Eli, in a room adjacent to the Tabernacle, if not in the Tabernacle itself, near by the lamp, still burning. A voice calling him awakens him out of his sleep. He thinks it is Eli, for Eli had often wanted him, and called to him in the dead of night. He is quickly at Eli's side, but is told that he had not called him. The boy returns to his bed, thinking probably that it was a dream. He is soon asleep, boy-like. Again he is awakened by the voice calling his name. He runs to Eli, saying, "Here am I, for thou didst call me." Eli answers, "I called not my son; lie down again." It is not so easy for Samuel to go to sleep the second time. He wonders a little, but it does not occur to him that the Lord could have called him. The third time he was awakened by the voice calling his name. Again he arose and went to Eli to do his bidding. Eli may have thought before that the boy was dreaming, but now he comes to recognize that Samuel has been hearing the voice of God, and that God wants to speak to him, and he tells Samuel so. Is the boy frightened? No, because from his earliest childhood he has been taught to consider himself the Lord's servant. We are told that Samuel went and lay down in his place, but not that he went to sleep; no, he lies awake, expecting to hear God's voice. Soon he hears the call, "Samuel, Samuel." And Samuel answers, "Speak Lord, for thy servant heareth." We can imagine the sweet treble voice of the boy, trained to tunes of adoration and praise. We can imagine the lamps fading away in the bright shining of God's presence. Does the child falter and tremble as he hears what God has to say to him? He may even have trembled, for he lay awake the rest of the night, but courage was born in him, for on the next morning he told Eli every whit and hid nothing from him, though the message contained a sad rebuke for Eli, because of his unfaithfulness to his own sons. We can see deep pity in the face of the noble boy as he tells Eli what the Lord has told him to say. A new page has been turned in Samuel's life book, and hereafter he will be recognized as "a prophet of the Lord."

Illustration and Application

At this season, when almost everyone is thinking what he will give to friends (we hope no one is thinking selfishly of what he will get), it is fitting to talk of a boy who was given to God from his birth, and even before. In this month, when we think of the Christ child, it is well to be reminded of a human "holy child," and how father, mother and child worked with God to make him good and true. Away with the notion that boys must sow "wild oats" first, and then be converted. Most of the Bible saints chose God as "first choice." Let us begin life right.

Personations of other Bible Boys who Started Right

I am an old man, who for forty years has been a prophet of the Lord. It has been laid on me to declare very unpleasant things concerning my country. In the Temple court, in the market-place, and in the royal chamber, I have not failed to do my duty. But to do this has cost me sorrow of heart. This work was laid upon me in early youth, and the burden seemed so great I exclaimed, "Ah, Lord, I cannot speak; I am but a child." Then the Lord put forth his hand and touched my mouth, and said, "Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth." For this work the Lord

What is it Like in the Bible?

LOIS AND EUNICE EDUCATING THE BOY TIMOTHY

created me. He gave me a vision in which he said: 'Before I formed thee, . . . I knew thee, and before thou camest forth . . . I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.' What is my name? Jeremiah.

I am a young man, but I know my life-work is accomplished. I know whereunto I am born. My father was a priest of God. Even while he was engaged in his priestly duties in the house of God, an angel appeared to him and told him that he should have a son, and the whole plan of my life was revealed to my father at that time. But my father doubted the vision, and it was told him that he should be unable to speak again until his son should be born. The name which the angel said should be mine was the first word he spoke after my birth. I was my mother's first child, though she was an aged woman when I was born. What was her name, and what is mine? John the Baptist.

I am a young man and a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ in a remote but powerful commercial city. The foundation of my usefulness as a preacher of the Gospel was laid by my mother and my grandmother, who, when I was a young child, taught me day by day the words of Holy Scripture. What is my name, and what are their names? Timothy, Eunice, Lois.

By laborious use of machinery, crooked trees, if not too old, can be straightened, but the wise course is to see that nothing makes them grow crooked at the start. The writer has a branch that some playful boys tied into a knot. The next day it could easily have been untied, but it was left in a knot for years and now has all grown together and never can be straightened. In the souls of men it is "never too late to mend," for God's kindness and power are equal to any case, but it is very hard to change one's habits of life after they are fixed, and how mean it is to give God only a crooked end of a life that should have been all given to him before it was marred by sin!

Every blacksmith knows that the iron is most easily and most perfectly shaped when it is hot, because it is then most plastic, and that every minute's delay makes the shaping harder and less perfect. So with the sculptor, who molds a beautiful child in wax or clay. It will be hard to do and badly done if the plastic material has been allowed to harden. In a cracker or biscuit we often see the maker's name, but every child knows that it had to be stamped there while the dough was soft. These illustrations all remind us that if a human life is to bear God's name and character most perfectly, the Christian life must be the first life.

Here is a mother in awful contrast to Hannah: A boy of seventeen came to his mother's room one night, and said, "Mother, I have been going to the special meetings in Central Church, and have about decided to be a Christian. If you will go with me to-night, I think I can decide it." The reply she made was, "My son, I cannot go to-night; I have an engagement." "To my shame," said the mother, "he found out what the engagement was—it was at a euchre party. I kept my engagement, but I lost my boy. He has not been in church for a year. No word of mine can affect him. My prayers have been of no avail, and I am heartbroken." But there are more conversions due to mothers than to any other human cause. But there are many stories of children leading older people to be Christians that are still more appropriate to the Samuel lesson when taught to the young. One of these stories has just come from England, of a young married woman, Marion Armstrong, who had no children and no religion, nor her husband either, who also professed to dislike children. A neighbor being ordered away for his health, Mrs. Armstrong asked the privilege of taking care of their little boy Max, believing she could thus overcome her husband's prejudice against children. The child wrought a deeper cure, for he had been taught to pray. "Marion," said Max (she had taught him to call her by her pet name), "Marion, my mother always sits on my little own chair and hears me say 'Gentle Jesus.' Will you?" "Of course I will," cried Marion, delightedly. "You must tell me everything your mother likes you to do, so that you will have forgotten nothing by the time she returns home." The child flung his arms round her neck as he climbed upon her knees. "This is how mother holds me," he explained. "Now I'll begin." He closed his eyes, clasped his hands, and rushed through his verses, closing with, "God bless everybody," to which he added, "And, Jesus, please bless Marion as well as my mother; and bless the man in this house—though I haven't seen him, but you have—just as you bless my father; and don't let me make too much noise. Amen." "That is a beautiful prayer," said Marion, much affected. "But does your dear mother like you to say it so quickly?" Oh, yes," said the child. "God hears it, because mother says he looks into my heart; and if I say it very slowly I always leave a piece out." "You shall say it in just your own way, darling," said Marion. "You are quite right, God understands every word." "How quickly do you and the man say yours?" asked Max. Marion was essentially truthful. "We don't say your verses, Max; I am afraid we say nothing." "Not even 'Thank you, Jesus, for all my blessings'?" "Nothing; except in church on Sundays," was the answer. "Ah! you're too busy, I suppose," was the ready conclusion. That was an arrow that went to its mark, and as she read the Bible to Max and heard his prayers she learned to pray herself, and her husband also, and again the Bible saying was illustrated, "A little child shall lead them."

When little Samuel woke and heard his Master's voice, At every word he spoke, how much he did rejoice! Oh blessed, happy child, to find the God of heaven so near and kind. If God would speak to me and say he was my friend, How happy I should be, ah how should I attend! And does he never speak to me? Oh, yes, and in his Word He bids me come and seek the God that Samuel heard.

Beyond Expectation

The Red Letter Bible received by me as a premium with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, far exceeds my most sanguine expectations. It is fully worth the whole price paid for both. We could not do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Cleveland, O.

These illustrations are miniature reproductions of the colored pictures in our book, "The Hall of Fame." The building, which stands on the banks of the Hudson, is shown in the centre. The portrait of Washington, WHO ALONE WAS UNANIMOUSLY ELECTED, was painted by Gilbert Stuart, whose picture is shown on the right. He was elected to the Hall of Fame as the greatest American portrait painter.

A HOLIDAY CHAT with our READERS

By the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Christmas Gifts

I am writing this by the first fire of winter. There is a cheerful crackling of burning logs; the fantastic flames leap up the chimney and cast a warm glow about the room. The spirit of Christmas is in the air.

Happily enough it is of Christmas gifts that I write, or talk; so please to draw up that easy chair to the fire and make yourself comfortable, while I tell you one or two things of interest, and give you some description of the gifts that we have prepared as a Christmas greeting to every reader of this paper.

You, like myself, and everyone else I know, are somewhat inquisitive; are even curious enough to wonder what your presents will be. I will say that these Christmas gifts have cost a great deal of money and labor, and, above all, a great deal of anxious thought. We have spared no cost or pains to make them really worth having, and this is true of every one of the premiums which are described on the following pages. Some of you may be able to drop into our office in the Bible House some time and see the premiums, and you might then take a walk through the rooms in which some two or three hundred girls are busily employed in addressing the wrappers, and sending off these gifts and premiums to all parts of the country. We should be very pleased to welcome you.

You Dream of Fame

But the beautiful bronze tablets that have been erected to these Immortals, by no means fill all the niches that have been provided in the Hall of Fame.

Dr. Banks has enlarged his book to give an account of the lives of those great men who were nominated for this highest honor that can be paid to their memory, and who failed of election by so few votes, that it is practically certain they will be chosen to take their place among the Immortals at the next election.

He has also given us sketches of the lives of the twenty American women who are considered most worthy, by the wonderful example and work of their lives, to be commemorated in our national Pantheon.

You must know, too, that besides the stories of the lives of these great Americans, the author has given a glowing account of the origin of the Hall of Fame, of the impressive dedication services, of the nomination of the candidates and the selection of the judges, so that the book is everything, and more than, its title implies. It contains over a hundred finely engraved portraits. The volume thus embodies a complete portrait gallery of the most illustrious men and women who have lived since white men were born upon American soil.

As we chat, you nod over the fire; you dream that you, or perhaps one of your children will so live, that, after the work is finished, your name shall be chosen to be immortalized in the beautiful building amidst the lawns and the peaceful woodlands by the side of the great river. The Temple of Fame stands ready with its welcome.

Choosing a Premium

But here I want to chat about some other premium books that are not mentioned there. We have a new edition of the International Teacher's Bible. This is bound in soft, flexible leather, with over-lapping edges, silk book-mark and durable leather lining. The edges of the leaves are gilt.

It is, you will find, the most perfect Bible ever offered to Sunday School workers and all students of the Scriptures.

It opens flat wherever you choose, and the thumb index is invaluable for quick and ready reference.

The Bible has the latest maps. All the Helps are fully illustrated. All the chapter numbers are in plain figures. It is self-pronouncing—a very young boy or girl can read the hard Scriptural names at first sight.

Hard it is sometimes to choose an appropriate Christmas gift; but the choicest and the best present is a beautiful Bible—above all, for some absent member of the family.

We will send the book to any address in any part of the country—price, $3.00, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year—sent either to the same address or any other. The same book without the thumb-index or leather lining, $2.00.

We also offer you our Red Letter Bible, which is more fully described on another page.

A Source of Inspiration

But, for the benefit of those who live at a distance, and cannot visit us, I will give some description of these books.

You must understand that they are what are known as gift-books; that is to say, large and handsome volumes, particularly suited as Christmas presents. They are beautifully bound, and printed on most expensive paper. One of them, by Louis Albert Banks, D.D., is called The Illustrated Story of the Hall of Fame.

High up on the wooded banks of the Hudson River stands the Hall of Fame, the superb building which has recently been erected to the memory of America's greatest men and women. It is, in one sense, the most interesting, and will become the most historic building in the country. Here are to be commemorated the names of the most illustrious representatives of the American nation, and the conferring of this great honor is done as it can only be—by popular vote.

At present, twenty-nine Immortals have been elected.

Who are the twenty-nine greatest Americans? What did they accomplish?

What is the story of their lives?

It is this great theme which has inspired Dr. Banks' book. I have read it and re-read it a great many times; and it is one of those books, the pages of which become dearer each time you read them. You come, as it were, in closer contact with those living forces that have made our country what it is. As much in the story of their disappointments and defeats, as in their high hopes and triumphs, will you find a source of inspiration and pride, just because you are a patriotic American.

301 Capital Stories

The Speaking Oak, by Ferdinand C. Iglehart, is indeed a beautiful gift-book. It contains more stories, I imagine, than any other book of its kind that was ever written, for there are three hundred and one complete tales, or one for almost every day of the year.

Here you will find stories of every nature—of love and adventure, of home and travel, of sea and of land, stories of mythology and stories of modern life.

It sparkles with anecdotes. It is filled with capital stories of famous men and women. The pages throb with human interest. You will not tire of these stories, because they play upon your every mood.

They will amuse you first—that is their primary object. But in them, too, you shall find encouragement and inspiration; and nobler purposes shall spring from these stories of brave deeds and great men and women, and wider sympathies shall fill your heart and mind when you read of their trials, their dreams and their achievements.

This is, indeed, a Christmas book—a volume of good tidings.

The price of The Speaking Oak and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, or The Hall of Fame and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a year, is only $2.00—if you are interested in some further particulars you will find them on the pages that follow.

What is a Premium?

"But," you say, as you lean back in your chair and stretch out your hands towards the fire that is filling us with all these Christmas notions, "What if I do not know of anyone who is without a Bible?"

We have thought of that. Look at that book which is lying here on the table by my elbow. This, too, is one of our premiums. The word "premium" means properly "a reward." It means, with us, a book that we offer you at cost, or less than cost, in recognition of your membership in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, and your right to all the privileges such membership brings.

Here is a book which thousands of Bible students have longed for, which is now placed within the reach of all. It should be a companion volume to the Bible in every American home.

I believe that everybody wants a Bible Dictionary; that they have only been waiting for the opportunity to secure a work the need of which they have earnestly felt ever since God's Holy Word became dear to their hearts.

Smith-Peloubet's Bible Dictionary will be found an indispensable help to the intelligent understanding of the sacred text. It is an encyclopædia—almost a library in itself—of information about the Bible and the Holy Land.

This great work contains 811 pages, 440 illustrations and eight splendid maps.

As our cloth edition is entirely exhausted, we can now only offer the Leather, Gilt Edge Edition, which, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, will cost you $3.00. If you want this superb book write at once, as we have but a very few copies left.

250,000 Gifts

But it is not my intention to talk only of Christmas gifts for you to give, I want to say something of the gift which it is to be our pleasure to send, absolutely free, to every subscriber, new or old, whether they choose or do not choose a premium.

It is no easy task to select a gift that will give equal pleasure to more than one-quarter of a million people.

But, if I am any judge of human nature, our Family Art Gallery will be received with real delight by you and all our readers.

It consists of ten reproductions, in their original colors and with all the strong effects of oil paintings, of famous pictures, measuring altogether a full thousand square inches.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art estimates the value of three of the originals alone at $86,000. These are Schenck's "Lost Sheep," Schreyer's "Arab Warriors" and Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair."

The latter is one of the most famous paintings in existence. Rosa Bonheur is considered the greatest animal painter who has ever lived. When you get the picture, study the exquisite coloring and the marvelous skill of the composition; give it a permanent place on the wall of your room, because it is the fac-simile of a masterpiece that the whole world flocks to see.

It may be interesting to you, who will possess this picture, if I recall a few facts about Rosa Bonheur's life. She was born at Bordeaux, France, March 22, 1822. From her childhood she was devoted to the study of animal life, and when her family moved to Paris she passed her days in the streets, making sketches of horses and dogs and availing herself of whatever opportunities for study presented themselves.

Her pictures at once won popular applause, and before long this was supplemented by the discriminating praise of good judges.

One of her early pictures was purchased by the French Government, and for a long time was considered her masterpiece. In 1855, however, her large picture, entitled "The Horse Fair," was exhibited in London and afterwards brought to the United States. The wonderful merit of this composition won for it universal applause and admiration. It is now considered her greatest work. The spirited manner in which the human and brute figures are represented gives the canvas a life-like appearance that is almost startling.

Mademoiselle Bonheur received many medals. Ten years after "The Horse Fair" was first exhibited, she was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. In 1868 she was appointed a member of the Institute of Antwerp. From 1849 she had been directress of a school of design in Paris.

A Priceless Picture

During the Franco-Prussian War, when the Germans were besieging Paris, the studio of Mademoiselle Bonheur was spared from molestation, by order of the Crown Prince of Prussia. These few facts you should remember; they will lend an additional interest to the reproduction of "The Horse Fair," which is one of the ten pictures that form our Christmas present to you.

Now, the beauty of this one picture is really a guarantee of the beauty of all the others in the Home Art Gallery, because it was necessary to find as companion pictures, paintings the fine qualities of which would not be dimmed beside this superb work.

The choice of these pictures has been a tremendous undertaking, and I only wish I could have the pleasure of being a witness of your delight when the Christmas offering of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is put into your hands by the postman.

The Value of Promptness

One point I wish to emphasize as strongly as I can. As Christmas approaches, the rush of business both in our own office and in the offices of express and transportation companies becomes enormous. It will not only be a convenience, but it will avert disappointment, if you renew your subscriptions and order your premiums now. Would it be too much to ask that you sit down at this very moment and fill up the regular order forms which you will find in the following pages?

You understand, of course, that even if your subscription does not expire until January or February, or any other time of the year, it does not matter. When you send the money for the premium offer, we date your subscription one year ahead of any date on which it may now expire, so that prompt action certainly cannot entail any loss. On the other hand, it will be to your advantage.

And now I would say a word about THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1903.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is an illustrated family magazine, but at the same time it is a newspaper. We cannot, as some magazines do, declare in advance, what will be the main features of the paper. The vital news of the week will always be the central point of interest.

But, there are one or two plans that I would like you to know about.

First, in regard to the covers. I intend that the covers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1903, shall not only surpass any we have yet published, but that in a large measure they shall be unique.

Looking Forward

Arrangements have been completed with Prof. Neogrady, the famous European artist, and one of the great names associated with the Imperial Academy of Buda-Pesth, to paint a series of beautiful pictures, which will be reproduced on the cover pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Some of these have been completed, and for the beauty of their design and the rich effects of color, they deserve to be called and, in fact are, masterpieces. There is not one which is not worthy to be cut out and framed, and which will not challenge comparison with other fine works of art. To do them full justice they will be reproduced on highly finished paper. These superb designs represent an enormous expenditure of money, and it is done simply to please you.

To meet the constant demand of our readers for more short stories, I have arranged for fifty-two complete tales by popular authors, which will appear during the year. Among the writers will be Irving Bacheller, author of Eben Holden, Amelia E. Barr, Marion Harland, Florence M. Kingsley, Margaret Sangster and Edith F. Black.

Sermons by famous preachers, will also form one of the attractions of the forthcoming year. In addition to the weekly sermon, we shall publish others by the Rev. C. M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps, by the Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, of London, England, and the Rev. R. S. MacArthur, of New York City.

Other regular contributors will be Mr. W. R. Moody, son of the late D. L. Moody; the Rev. C. H. Yntman, the noted revivalist; J. W. Baer, of World-wide Endeavor fame; and Ira D. Sankey, the Gospel singer and evangelist.

A special feature of the paper will be profusely illustrated articles of general interest, and a series of fascinating contributions entitled "Margaret Bottoms's Drawing-room Talks." These will appear at regular intervals.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is essentially a paper of the home. There is hardly one of the great women writers whose names are known and loved in every household, who will not contribute to our pages in 1903.

The Family Page, the Sunday School Page, the Page of Questions and Answers and the other popular departments of the paper, will be carried on with such improving and brightening as may come with a special effort to add on all sides to the attractive appearance of the paper.

Here we have been sitting by the fire and talking of Christmas, and looking forward far into the coming year, as folks will, as they stare down into the glowing embers. The holiday feeling is in the air. It seems quite proper to end by saying, "The compliments of the season to you."

The Songs of Zion

BY REV. JOSEPH HAMILTON, MIMICO, CANADA

THERE'S lots of music in the Psalms,
Those dear, sweet Psalms of old,
With visions bright of lands of light,
And shining streets of gold;
I hear them ringing, singing still,
In memory soft and clear,
"Such pity as a father hath Unto his children dear."

They seem to sing for evermore
Of better, sweeter days,
When the lilies of the love of God
Bloomed white in all the ways;
And still I hear the solemn strains
In the quaint old meeting house,
"O greatly blessed the people are The joyful sound that know."

No singing books we needed then,
For very well we knew
The tunes and words we loved so well
The dear old Psalm Book through;
To "Coleshill" at the Sacrament
We sang, as tears would fall,
"I'll of salvation take the cup,
On God's name will I call."

And so I love the dear old Psalms,
And when my time shall come,
Even when the light has left my eyes,
And my singing lips are dumb,
Upon the wings of sacred song
I'd gladly soar away—
"So pants my longing soul, O God,
That come to thee I may."

Delighted with Her Book

"I am delighted with The Speaking Oak. These short stories about our distinguished men are very interesting and profitable. The book will be the means of doing much good." Lancaster, Pa. MRS. M. J. PORTER.

Prehistoric Cities in Palestine

The Ruins of Four Cities found Buried beneath One Another

AN interesting confirmation of Bible history is described in the recent report of the Palestine Exploration Fund. It carries us back to the time of Joshua, and proves not only that there was such a city as that mentioned by the great Hebrew leader, but that it was inhabited by just such people as he describes. They were a race, we are told, addicted to human sacrifices. After more than three thousand years the spade has brought up skeletons of men, women, and children who had been offered in sacrifice. Thus the prediction of the Psalmist is fulfilled, that "Truth shall spring out of the earth."

On the right hand of the road, as the traveler journeys from Jaffa to Jerusalem, is a heap of ruins now known as Tell-eljezari. Here excavations have been made that have revealed the ruins of a town which has been identified as Gezer, the Canaanite city, the king of which was slain by Joshua.

An astonishing fact is, that beneath these ruins were found evidences of the ruins of three other cities, occupied by entirely different inhabitants, and dating far back into prehistoric times.

The New York Sun, in its report of a paper written by Professor McAlister for the quarterly statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund, gives some remarkable facts in regard to these discoveries. In the bottom layers were found three unhewn monoliths, fourteen feet high, with smaller ones between, and buried beneath an adjoining pavement were jars containing the charred bones of infants, which seem to give evidence that this was a place of human sacrifice.

Two caves were also discovered. The floor of one was covered with a layer of human ashes and bones, and Professor McAlister believes it was used as a crematory by the first or the second of the races who inhabited the town. In the other cave were found several skeletons, an examination of which led to the belief that some of them were of human beings who had been offered as sacrifices.

The pottery of the earlier race was coarse and rude; but neither this nor specimens of the later work conformed to either Egyptian or Phœnician designs. Other relics, however, proved that there was communication with Egypt, and the discovery of a clay cylinder indicated that there was direct or indirect trade with Babylon.

The uncremated remains of the inhabitants of the third, and perhaps the fourth, city show that they were taller, the average height being sixty-six inches, while some of them reached seventy-one. They were also more strongly built, their faces were longer, their noses more prominent, and their skulls more circular. They probably belonged to the earliest wave of Semitic immigration.

Remember the Children

We trust our readers will not forget Mrs. Bird's plea for the poor little children of the East Side tenements. She is preparing a Christmas Tree for them, and she asks our friends to help her dress five hundred dolls for the wee tenement maids.

Won't you help her? If you will, send your contribution to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we will promptly forward it to Mrs. Bird, and acknowledge it besides. Don't forget the children.

Books of the Bible

THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE great Jehovah speaks to us
In Genesis and Exodus;
Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy;
Joshua and Judges rule the land;
Ruth gleams the sheaf with trembling hand;
Samuel and numerous Kings appear,
Whose Chronicles we wondering hear;
Ezra and Nehemiah now
Esther, the beauteous maiden, show;
Job speaks in sighs, David in Psalms,
And Proverbs teach to scatter alms;
Ecclesiastes then comes on
And the sweet song of Solomon;
Isaiah, Jeremiah, then
With Lamentations takes his pen;
Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea's lyres Swell Joel, Amos, Obadiah's;
Jonah, Micah, Nahum come
And lofty Habakkuk finds room;
Zephaniah, Haggai calls;
Rapt Zechariah builds his walls,
And Malachi, with garments rent,
Concludes the ancient Testament.

THE NEW TESTAMENT

This is the way the gospels run:
Matthew, Mark and Luke and John;
Then come the Acts inviting you
The apostolic church to view;
The Romans and Corinthians are
To cities sent renowned afar;
Galatians and Ephesians then Wrote by the same inspired pen;
Philippians and Colossians stand
With Thessalonians near at hand;
Timothy leads to Titus on;
This brings us down to Philemon;
The Hebrews then we gladly find,
And that of James comes close behind;
To Peter then our thoughts we give
With loving John we wish to live;
Pious Jude will pierce the soul,
And Revelation close the whole.

AN IDLE WORD

A NEW STORY, WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD : : :

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE house was certainly most uncomfortable. Something was wrong with the range, and breakfast was late. Now, trains will wait for no man, and Jack Stimson had to take the 7.20 to town, or be derelict in his duty to his employer. The loose stitch in the Stimson economy was the fact that Helen Stimson had not been brought up to heed the value of minutes. She was a sweet, blue-eyed girl when she was married to Jack; lively and pretty and engaging, but always unpunctual. So long as the couple had no children, this defect of Helen's had been no more than an inconvenience. They had scrambled along somehow, and Jack had usually held on to his temper, and caught his train on the fly, tearing down the road as the engine whistled at the junction, and springing on the step of the baggage-car as the train left the station. Helen never could comprehend the necessity for a half-hour's earlier start in the morning, nor be brought to see herself as at all to blame for Jack's hurriedly snatched morning meal. Twelve years had passed, as years do. They had two children, Francis and Irene, and the scramble was now worse than ever, for the children had to go to school, and school opened relentlessly at nine o'clock. Disorder is the handmaid of chronic tardiness. Irene's spelling-book and overshoes and box of pencils were all over the house, and had to be gathered up morning after morning, while her long, golden hair was in process of curling, and her frocks and aprons were buttoned up behind. As she was decidedly her father's pet, he resented any criticism of her fractiousness or her carelessness, while Francis, the older, and a boy, came in for scolding if he ventured on a criticism. The breakfast table became a scene of what Francis called "scraps." At the best of times the little family did not finish a meal without friction. Irene would call her mother from the table to look for a missing hair-ribbon; Francis would linger in his room reading last evening's paper, and Jack, between necessary trips to the cellar to shake the furnace and put on coal, and gulps of scalding coffee taken in frantic haste, was growing sallow, worn and dyspeptic. As for Helen, her blue-eyed, pink-cheeked, porcelain daintiness was fading fast. She was worried-looking and thin, and a frown puckered up her forehead and stole the sweetness from her face.

When the range wouldn't burn on this particular morning, and Jack, practically breakfastless, had to rush for the train, the last shred of his threadbare patience gave way. He snatched his overcoat from the rack, and started without a word.

"Oh! father," cried Irene, "don't go without kissing me," and the child flew down the garden path after him.

He stopped to give her a hasty kiss.

"Good morning, Jack!" called Helen.

"Good morning!" he answered gruffly. "I don't care if I never come back." And he strode savagely off, running directly as if in a race.

"That poor fellow!" said a neighbor, who was familiar with the happy-go-lucky, or rather wretched-go-lucky ways of the Stimson household.

"You may well say it," replied the neighbor's husband. "Jack Stimson is a man of more than average ability if he had a fair show. He has no bad habits, never tastes liquor, sticks close to business, and is honest as the day, but he's going to pieces on the rocks of a badly managed home. Still a man ought to be careful how he leaves his people in the morning. One never knows when one goes out what dangers may face him before his return."

"That's true!" said the lady.

Meanwhile, tranquillity temporarily enfolded the perturbed domestic atmosphere of the Stimsons. Francis and Irene were off at school. Helen had a long, clear morning before her. Luncheon did not have to be ready for the children till half-past twelve, and dinner was at the far end of the day at half-past six. A woman with faculty would have straightened her rooms, made her beds, and prepared her luncheon, so that when she was ready to sit down, she would have her day's work well in hand. Not so Helen Stimson. She was in the midst of a most fascinating novel, and she did not begin to clear away the dishes, or coax the refractory range, or do one of the things that needed doing, because she simply had to find out how her book ended. Whether Lady Isabel chose her rich or her humble suitor, and what happened to

If Marguerite observed the chill confusion of Helen's home and the chill reticence of Helen's greeting, she gave no sign of doing so.

She had faculty! Everything about Marguerite Hayes indicated a well-balanced mind and a strictly obeyed conscience. She went to her room, slipped on a working dress, and coming down stairs at once, swiftly and silently "took hold," and helped Helen to put her house in order. When the children came in to luncheon, they shouted for joy. Aunt Marguerite brought an element of joy with her into that usually jarring and discordant home. As Helen felt the quiet strength of her sister's presence, her frown grew fainter, and she looked a little like her old pretty self as she arrayed herself in a becoming gown.

"SIX WEEKS LATER, JACK STIMSON HOBBOLED IN ON CRUTCHES" the portionless cousin whose beauty was so great as to eclipse that of Isabel, were at present problems that loomed large in Helen's mind.

On the wife and mother depend all the peace of a home, as a rule. There are exceptions, but they are few. Helen Stimson read till eleven o'clock, when she finished her book with a sigh. There was everything to do, the house was in heaps. The kitchen fire was out. There were only fragments in the pantry. The cat came mewling insistently. Pussy had had nothing to eat since yesterday.

"Oh, dear!" cried Helen, looking out of the window. "Of all days for her to come, this day!"

Then she opened the door for her older sister Marguerite, a fastidious spinster, who had a way of dropping in on her from the neighboring village, without previous notice, and staying a week at a time.

The two sisters sat together when the children had gone to their afternoon school.

"Were you surprised to see me to-day?" asked Marguerite.

"Yes, very much."

"I fancied you would be. I had one of my intuitions. I was sure you were in some pressing need of me. Yet possibly I was wrong. I do trust I was. How is Jack in these days?"

"Crosser than a bear. Getting to be a perfect crank," was Helen's brusque reply.

"A man needs to be kept in comfort, Helen. You have never appreciated that."

"You have never been married, Marguerite. You don't know how exasperating a husband can be. His shirts always want repair; his socks always want darning; he never can wait an instant for a meal. When I think of Jack as my adoring lover and Jack as my complaining husband, I cannot reconcile the two men."

"Don't you care for Jack any more, Sister?" asked Marguerite. "I am amazed to hear you speak so bitterly."

"Oh, yes, I do; but, Marguerite, he is so horrid. Why, when he went away, only this morning, he shouted at me from the gate, loud enough for the McCanns and the Leslies to hear, 'Good morning, I don't care if I never come back!' I was so angry! I shall tell him what I think of such conduct when he comes home."

"I hope not until the dinner is over, and the children are asleep," rejoined Marguerite, repressing an inclination to remonstrate further. "By-the-bye, I'll make apple dumplings for dessert. Jack and the kids are so fond of dumplings."

Among Marguerite's talents, cooking took a deservedly high place. She liked to fuss. Helen said, but fussing was absent from her neat-handed and deft fashion of compounding delicate dishes. Her mother often wondered why Marguerite, with her genius for home-making, remained unmarried, while Helen, who seemed only made to be carried along, never quite equal to fulfilling her obligations, had married early. Marguerite laughingly declared that she prized her freedom. She was popular and beloved, and could turn her practical hand to anything from painting a picture to tossing an omelet.

The apple dumplings were foam-light, and done to a turn, when Jack's train came in. He never had been known to miss the six o'clock train. Irene watched for him from the window.

But the six o'clock train came to-day, and the seven, and the eight, and brought no Jack. Dinner was eaten at last in great anxiety, and Marguerite and Helen sat down to taste the bitter dread of dull suspense. The children went to bed, Irene crying herself to sleep. Helen refused to undress. At midnight a messenger brought a telegram:

Mr. Stimson in — Hospital. Badly hurt. Come first train. (Signed) A. JENKINS, M.D.

Helen read the dispatch as if petrified. All her anger at Jack melted away now in the misery of knowing that he was hurt and needed her. She did not weep or lament. With swift fingers she packed a small bag, and in the early gray of the morning, after a sleepless night, she hurried down the frost-white road, through a silent village, to take the first train. Few passengers from their station ever took that train. It had to be flagged. She aroused the agent, who lived near the station, and he fixed the flag on the platform, so that the train would stop.

Helen did a good deal of thinking as she sat, the only woman in a car packed with laborers going to their long day's work, carrying dinner-pails, and wearing rough clothes.

She heard one rough-looking man say to another:

"I tell you what, mate; a man doesn't mind hard work, when he's got such a wife as mine to go back to at night."

Helen did a deal of hard thinking. What sort of wife had her Jack come home to at night?

She reached the hospital, and sent in her name. A white-capped nurse presently stepped into the room where the wife waited, standing beside a table.

"We found the address in Mr. Stimson's pocket. He is very weak, but there is just the merest shade of hope. At midnight there was none. Can you be very calm, Mrs. Stimson?"

"Yes," answered Helen, briefly. She felt frozen stiff. "What happened to Jack?"

"He was hurrying for his train, and

A Great Career Closing

DR. JOSEPH PARKER, THE FAMOUS
PASTOR OF THE CITY TEMPLE, LONDON

THE CITY TEMPLE, LONDON

WHEN the cable brought the news, on November 20, that Dr. Joseph Parker, the famous pastor of the City Temple, London, was prostrated by severe illness, there was general apprehension among his many friends in this country that the end of his busy life was near at hand. Dr. Parker had attained the age of seventy-two years, and, though many ministers live and preach at a more advanced age, it was realized that his life had not been of the kind that encouraged hope of his recovery. All through, it had been one of storm and stress. His prominence in the religious life of the British Metropolis and his recognized ability as a preacher and writer made him the subject of criticism that was not always kind. He was a man of positive nature, believing thoroughly all he did believe, and with little patience for men who differed with him. Yet with this disposition, he was a man of bold original thought, who often used expressions which critics who were inclined to animadversion, could use as a basis for charges of heterodoxy.

How much does a man owe to the region of his birth? Dr. Parker frequently called attention to the fact that he was born in that country of hard fighters, just south of the Scottish border, which, early in British history, was the scene of many a sanguinary struggle between the Saxon and the Scot. A hardy, vigorous race developed there, which, in these peaceful times is sure, wherever it has wandered, to show its pugnacious qualities. His parents were very poor, and his earliest recollection was of running around without shoes or stockings, going to school only when no work that a child could do, was to be had. But even then, there was grit and ambition in him that triumphed over difficulties. He managed to obtain the rudiments of an education, and as soon as he began to earn a livelihood for himself every minute he could spare was given to study. He wanted to be a lawyer, and there is no doubt that if his aspiration had been fulfilled he would have attained high rank in that profession; but he was a chosen instrument of Christ, and when the call reached him it was promptly obeyed.

Hitherto he had been identified with the Wesleyan Methodist Church, but the smallest semblance of control was irksome to the ardent lover of personal liberty.

That the Conference should designate his sphere of labor and should have supervision of his work was intolerable to him, and before beginning his theological studies he severed his connection with the Wesleyans and joined the Congregational Church. He was little more than twenty-three years of age when a church in the old-fashioned town of Banbury invited him to become its pastor. It was a dull, sleepy place, with little religious life, but the strong, vigorous preaching of the young man stirred the people, and the little church soon became too small for the crowds who came to hear him. A larger edifice was built, and that, too, was crowded at every service. The ability of the young preacher was noised abroad and a much more influential sphere was opened to him. He was invited to become pastor of the Cavendish Chapel in Manchester, one of the most prominent Congregational pulpits in the country. Its building was almost cathedral-like in style, and the members of the church were rich merchants and manufacturers.

His work in Manchester will never be forgotten. The highly-educated and critical congregation became enthusiastic over their new pastor and their beautiful church was thronged with strangers, who came from all parts of the city. But even that eminent pulpit could not retain the eloquent preacher. The metropolis, which as provincials complain, claims the best of everything, insisted on having Dr. Parker there. The most famous Congregational pulpit, once occupied by the chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, was offered to Dr. Parker, and with some reluctance at leaving the city that so heartily appreciated him, was accepted. A new edifice was built on the Holborn Viaduct, in the heart of London, and in 1869 Dr. Parker began a ministry there, which for thirty-three years has been unparalleled in English Congregationalism for influence and usefulness.

The sermons delivered at the City Temple, as Dr. Parker's church was called, were remarkable, not only for their eloquence but for their profound thought. He had a peculiar skill in penetrating from the outer shell of a passage to the principle lying within, and showing how it applied to modern life. Many of the passages of the Old Testament which appeared to apply only to events of Jewish history took on new meaning under his treatment. Young men inclined to scepticism saw how strong a foundation Christianity had and were brought into the church. Dr. Parker's ministry was essentially a ministry for thinking hearers, and few such could resist his logic. One experiment alone shows the hold he had on educated London. He announced that he would hold a short service on Thursday at noon. He was told that it was the busiest day of the week, and noon the busiest hour of the day, and that only women would come to hear him. But the result justified his decision. Bankers, brokers, merchants came, and soon the Thursday noon services at the Temple became an institution. Rarely in that large building was there a seat vacant, and men were in an overwhelming majority. The services have been held now for nearly thirty years and have been abundantly blessed.

Dr. Parker was a prolific writer. Besides numerous contributions to the periodical press, he found time to write many large volumes. One of his earlier works was Ecce Deus, a complement to Prof. Seely's Ecce Homo. Another, which did valuable service in staying the tide of scepticism, was Helps to Truth-Seekers. But probably the work by which he will be best remembered was his People's Bible, a series of expository articles on passages of the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. It consists of twenty large volumes, which have been reprinted in this country by Funk & Wagnalls of New York. It is not a commentary, but is an effort to show how the principles of the Bible writers are related to the present day.

HOW A REVIVAL CAME

REV. H. H. LEAVITT, Pastor of the Broadway Congregational Church, Somerville, Mass., Describes a Recent Ingathering of Souls

THE view widely, and, I believe, honestly held, that the church has outgrown revivals has caused many pastors and churches to struggle with church problems, hopeless of finding solution in those "Refreshings from on High," which used to be the refuge of the people of God. It has seemed to the writer in the light of this condition, that it might be helpful to his fellow pastors and inspiring to other churches, if he narrates some simple facts in the recent experience of his own church.

About a year ago, the writer concerned as pastor of his people, over the condition of many in his congregation and in the locality, who either were not Christians, or who had not made confession of their faith by connecting themselves with the church, drew up a list of their names, placing a number against each. He then appealed to the praying Christians in his church to make each person on the list the subject of special prayer. To avoid any personal feeling, only the number corresponding with the name on the list was made known to the persons so praying. In response to this appeal, many numbers were taken, and, in an important sense, the entire list was in the prayer of the people.

During the last spring some tokens of new life were manifest, and about April 1 the pastor raised the question, with the Superintendent of the Sunday School, whether it would not be best to have a "Decision day" in the school. With some hesitancy it was decided to do so, and the day was fixed for the last Sunday of April. The interval was devoted to special meetings of teachers and officers of the school, for prayer for their classes. It was planned to have an outside voice to address the school that day, and by a providence, which was unexpected and unplanned for Mr. S. M. Sayford, of the New England Evangelistic Association, was invited, and responded. It was the first time the pastor had ever met him, and the first time practically in his nearly thirty years of ministry, that he had ever had an evangelist work with him. He had not looked upon evangelists as called to work with the established church, when it had its pastor on the ground. Probably he would not have favored this evangelist's coming then, if as pastor he had been responsible for it. The simplicity, the carefulness and the conservative methods of Mr. Sayford, together with the manifest stamp upon him of the Divine call to his work, won the hearts of a large and critical audience, who had been accustomed to no such persons among us. The seal of God, too, was upon his work that day, for on that Sunday and the next, more than sixty members of the Sunday School, above twelve years of age and most of them several years older than that, expressed the purpose to live the Christian life.

The Church, the Sunday School, and the Christian Endeavor Society, realized the tremendous responsibility which this new manifestation brought to us, and after careful deliberation, Mr. Sayford, as the one who had been used by God to awaken these newly-declared purposes in so many hearts, with his coadjutor and singer, Mr. Smith, of the same Association, were invited to spend a week with us. Meanwhile everything was done, that could be, to help those making first essays in Christian life. These evangelists came and held a week of services, in the thought of the church, largely to nurture those already taking first steps in the Christian life. They still followed the most conservative method. The preaching was entirely biblical, practically studies of God's Word. The choice of the soul was placed before it, in all the caution of one fearful of letting any one take so great a step when not fully ready. The result was a great help to the new beginners in Christian living to the church, as a whole, while several new persons came to decision.

The outcome was so satisfactory, that the Church Committee, especially in view of the fact that only a few of the older persons in the congregation had been reached, decided to ask these brethren to come to us again, at the opening of the fall work, and spend two weeks with us. They did so, beginning Sunday, October 5, and remaining through October 19. Our own church alone was responsible for these services.

And what results can now be shown? These will be better understood when it is stated that, with all our previous efforts for fruitage, and these had always been made, during the first three communion seasons of this year, that is, before any results of this special work were gathered, we received, on confession of faith, two persons. During the entire year of 1901 we received, on confession of faith, one person. In the last three reception seasons of this year, while we have been gathering in the results of this work, we have received into the church, on confession of faith, forty persons, and there are more than double that number who declare themselves to be committed to the Christian life; many, and perhaps all, of whom will be gathered in, in the near future. Besides all this, as would be expected, the whole outlook of the church has been changed; new faith has come, new desires have been born for a continuance of this work as the best work of the church. Last Lord's Day four men, of thirty-five years old or upwards, heads of families, united with our church. Further, there is an open door to many a heart now that, but a little time ago, seemed hopelessly closed. These brethren have proved themselves to us men of rare wisdom and devotion, and eminently men for these times; called of God.

God's way with his church has been, in the days of the fathers, when the state of spiritual life had come to be low, to manifest himself in his church, in a special work of his spirit, quickening the church and opening to them avenues to hearts hitherto closed. It was the work of God beyond all gainsaying. Great ingatherings have come to the church in this way. God's method has not changed. It was, in the past, by "Revival." It is still by Revival. The faith of the church has run very low. But, though the return is slow, to trust in God for "Revival," wherever it is the will of the pastor and the church to return, God, who was the Trust of our fathers, will prove himself to be our Trust.

The HEAVENS in MIDWINTER

Their Present Position and Aspect in the December Sky

By GARRETT P. SERVISS

THE midwinter skies are the most glorious of the whole year; then the great constellations, Orion, Taurus and Auriga reign in the centre of the heavens, and the magnificent Sirius, the peerless captain of the stellar hosts, sparkles with diamond hues as he follows the stately march of his bright battalions up from the East.

To recognize and to watch these constellations is, for every contemplative and impressible mind, one of the joys of existence. I would rather be ignorant of many things terrestrial than not to know these supernal splendors of celestial space. It is to me a constant source of amazement, as well as of regret, that comparatively so few intelligent and educated persons are familiar with them. The uplifting of the soul, the cultivation of the intellect and the imagination, which so many scholars find in classical studies, occupying years of hard endeavor, are fully matched by the mental stimulus and satisfaction afforded by the easily acquired knowledge of the starry skies. The man or woman who never gazes, spellbound at the glories of the firmament, and for whom one star differeth not from another, misses half the possible pleasure and profit of life. The chart herewith presented represents the sky at about 11:30 p. m. in the middle of December; 10:30 p. m. at the opening of January; 9:30 p. m. in the middle of January, and 8:30 p. m. at the opening of February. The reader will remember that in one month the position of the constellations shifts thirty degrees westward, and thirty degrees in angular measurement are equivalent to two hours of time, so that by looking at the sky on any night, say at 8 p. m., and again at 10 p. m., the same change in the position of the stars will be seen to have taken place that would occur in the course of a month, if the hour of observation remained the same at the beginning and end of the month.

The constellation Orion, high up in the south, is just on the meridian. The celestial equator runs through the middle of this constellation close by the starry belt of the giant, for Orion in mythology represents a great hunter said to have been slain by Diana, and afterward transported to the skies. There is no constellation equal in splendor to Orion, the famous Southern Cross, though very beautiful, being inferior in impressiveness. Orion has two very fine stars of the first magnitude, Betelgeuse in the shoulder and Rigel in the foot, while the three second magnitude stars, constituting the Belt, possess an extraordinary attraction for the eye on account of the beautiful way in which they match and reinforce one another.

The observer should not fail to notice carefully the difference in color between Betelgeuse and Rigel. The former is of a pale topaz color, while Rigel is as dazzlingly white as a Golconda diamond. Another great attraction of Orion is the wonderful nebula, faintly visible even to the naked eye, in the middle of the short row of little stars hanging below the Belt, and known as the Sword. The possessor of a telescope finds hours of delight in studying the double and multiple stars with which Orion abounds.

No one can fail to notice that Rigel in Orion, Aldebaran in Taurus, Capella in Auriga, the twins Castor and Pollux in Gemini, Procyon in Canis Minor, and Sirius in Canis Major, form the corners of a great hexagonal figure, which is very beautiful to look upon when once the eye has noted its existence.

Starting from Orion, we follow the outlines of this figure in a counter, clock-wise direction. Aldebaran is found at the termination of one of the uprights of a conspicuous V-shaped figure, which, as a star group, is called Hyades, and which forms the most easily recognized part of the constellation Taurus. Aldebaran is of a beautiful reddish color, and is sometimes described as rose-hued. In brilliancy it is very near the standard for the first stellar magnitude. Rigel and Betelgeuse are really above the first magnitude, and so are Capella and Procyon, while Sirius is so far above it that in photometry he is ranked in a class all alone by himself.

Westward from the Hyades glimmer the Pleiades, which modern discoveries, principally with the aid of photography, have shown to consist of a wonderful tangle of stars and nebulous mist in wisps and spirals.

Capella we find almost in the zenith, a very beautiful white star, whose light, on account of the star's position, is exceedingly steady, and undisturbed by prismatic flickering. Castor and Pollux, though neither is of the full first magnitude, make a beautiful couple, hardly yielding, in their combined display of radiance, to the greater members of the array of which they form a part.

Procyon, or the little Dog Star, has a somewhat lone situation, in a comparatively barren region. It is one of those remarkable stars, not great in number, which are known to be attended by invisible, or barely visible, companions of immense mass, which sway their more brilliant comrades by their attraction.

Sirius is accompanied by a number of stars, which would form a more conspicuous constellation but for the eclipsing splendor of their great leader. Yet Sirius, although to our eyes the brightest star in the heavens, is by no means the greatest in actual magnitude. Capella, for instance, if it were as near as Sirius, would appear four times as bright as Sirius does, while Regulus, Canopus, Arcturus and Gemma Cassiopeia, would, in similar circumstances, outshine Sirius at least thirty times.

Still, Sirius is thirty times more luminous than the sun, so that he must be reckoned a true giant among stars.

It is interesting to watch the play of Sirius' rays on a night when there is a little frost in the air. The color of the star is white, with a tinge of bluish-green, but when the atmosphere is unsteady, he shows, with marvelous vivacity of twinkling, all the colors of the rainbow, constantly shifting and intermingling in a most bewildering manner.

There are few sights in nature more captivating than the prismatic play of the rays of Sirius, beaming above a landscape of sparkling snow, when the atmospheric conditions are just suited to the display of all his scintillant beauty. Sirius has a close companion, a half or a third as massive as himself, but so lacking in luminosity that a powerful telescope is required to render it visible. The two circle round their common centre of gravity in a period of about fifty years.

It will be observed that the Milky Way spans the winter heavens from southeast to northwest. Capella lies in its edge, Perseus is completely immersed in it, and Cassiopeia, over in the northwest, also breaks its course with her stars, which lie like sparkling golden stones, making ripples in the luminous but transparent current. Andromeda appears half way down the western slope of the sky, with the Great Square in Pegasus below her. Farther, toward the left, below the Pleiades, are seen Aries and Pisces, with Cetus low down in the southwest.

Over in the north are Cepheus, Draco and Ursa Major, the Great Dipper in the last named constellation standing on the end of its handle, with the bowl open toward Polaris. Rising in the East are Leo and Hydra. The star Regulus in Leo has been mentioned above as one of the greatest in actual magnitude in the known universe. It is believed to outshine our sun a thousandfold, that is to say, if we were as near to Regulus as we are to the sun, that star would shed upon us a thousand times as much light as we now get from our luminary of day.

Between the sickle-shaped figure marking the head and fore parts of Leo and the twin stars of Gemini, glistens the "Beehive," a cluster of small stars in the inconspicuous constellation Cancer.

In Gemini, at the spot marked on the chart with a cross, is the position of the Summer Solstice, the highest northern declination attained by the sun, about the 21st of June each year.

None of the planets is shown on the chart because, although several of them are visible in either the morning or the evening sky, yet none comes within the limits of the chart at the time for which it is drawn. On the 1st of January, Mercury, Venus, and Saturn are all in the constellation Sagittarius, Jupiter is in Capricornus and Mars is in Virgo. Neptune, it is true, comes within the chart's limits, being situated in Gemini, not far from the place of the Summer Solstice, but this planet cannot be seen with the naked eye, and even with a powerful telescope it is an inconspicuous and disappointing object.

We have thus completed, in this brief series of articles, the circuit of the sky. Those who wish to pursue farther the study of the constellations, and there should be thousands to do it, would best seek guidance in books written for the purpose, and with the aid of more elaborate charts.

WONDERFUL DOGS OF THE NORTHLAND

THE Eskimo dogs, which are so invaluable in the snow-countries as beasts of burden, are born thieves, and neither kindness nor the infliction of punishment can break them of this habit. They will always steal, whenever they can find or make the opportunity. They will even leave their usual supper of white fish, to go and tear smoked moose-skin moccasins down from a clothes-line, and greedily devour them. Nothing seems too tough for their digestion, whether it is an old leather shirt or the whip of a cruel driver, of which they will speedily devour the lash, even if it is ten feet long, and only made of braided buckskin and loaded with shot. It is a common habit of theirs to eat their own harness.

It is only with the greatest difficulty that live stock can be protected from them. Though sheep be penned in a log cabin, with a door of two-inch spruce plank, they will cut through those spruce planks with their sharp teeth, and dispatch the animals with such speed and skill that hardly any noise is likely to be heard to give warning of what is going on. The next morning the clever dogs will keep out of their master's way, and not come within his reach for twenty-four hours.

These animals have ideas of their own as to who shall be their masters. Dogs owned and trained by Indians do not like white people, and if they discover that they are dragging a white man, they are likely to turn upon him with all the savageness of their wolf-like natures.

Egerton R. Young, the missionary, in his latest book, My Dogs in the Northland, issued by Fleming H. Revell Co., tells a story of a wild ride he took behind some fierce brutes belonging to an Indian to whose home he was going, and who insisted on placing his fresh dogs at Mr. Young's disposal, so that he might hurry on to his destination, leaving his own wearied animals to follow at a more leisurely pace. "Before me," he says, "was the great frozen lake, stretching away and far beyond the distant horizon. To my inexperienced eye, there was on that icy expanse not the vestige of a road. Yet during the long hours of this intensely cold night, without a single human companion, I was going to trust myself to the care of four Eskimo animals, to run me thirty miles to a lonely log house on the distant shore. During these long hours, I was neither to cough, nor speak a single word, for fear of trouble, or perhaps a fierce battle with these savage brutes and, if it should take place, who could tell which side would win in the conflict."

All went well until a black fox crossed the path of the dogs, who promptly started off in pursuit. Realizing the danger to which he was now exposed, of losing the trail, Mr. Young braced himself on his knees, and with his robes well around him, and the whip held so that he could use the handle as a club, he sternly shouted to the dogs in Indian language to stop and then turn to the left. The instant they heard his voice they did stop, and that so suddenly, that the rapidly moving cariole went sliding on and passed the rear dog of the team, so far as his traces would allow. Then they went for the missionary furiously.

One by one they attacked him, and it was not until he had knocked them down in turn with stunning blows that they were sufficiently cowed to submit to his commands. But even then they harbored a spirit of revenge. At the bottom of the hill on which the house of the Indian stood was a sunken fence, with a drop of about five or six feet into the yard. And instead of approaching the house in the usual way, the dogs, furious and revengeful at the white man who had angered them, sprang over the high stockade into the drifts beyond—a mad leap of over ten feet.

The Eskimo dogs are very clever in straightening out their traces after a mix-up of this kind, or after a fight. The cleverest of the pack is put nearest the sleigh, and his quick eye and active movements are responsible for the safe steering along dangerous trails or between the trees of a forest. If the dogs in front of him have, in their foolishness, dashed between two trees growing so close together that it is doubtful whether there is room for the sleigh to pass without injury, it is the duty of the last dog in the team to throw himself back so quickly that the animals in front are brought to a standstill, as though pulled up with a lasso.

The dogs, however, consider it a proud position to be in the lead. On one occasion Mr. Young harnessed up a young dog ahead of an old favorite, who had long been leader of the team. When he gave the word to start, he discovered that the young dog's traces had been eaten through by the ex-leader. Mr. Young mended the harness, but no sooner had he done so than the infuriated veteran fell upon the young interloper, and there was nothing for it but to use the whip to remind him of his place. Then the poor dog collapsed. His proud, eager and ambitious spirit was completely broken. Detecting this, Mr. Young at once restored him to his coveted place as leader. But it was too late. The dog's heart was broken. He never forgave his master for the humiliation and the blow, and though Mr. Young afterwards put on him his best harness, decorated with ribbons and silver bells, of which the dogs are so fond, his spirits continued to droop, and in a few days he went off by himself and died.

Among his dogs, Mr. Young possessed a grand St. Bernard, named Jack. This beautiful animal was very useful in looking after the Eskimo dogs, which, when the time came to make a start in the morning, would often lie hiding in the snow or skulking in the shadows of the wood. All that was necessary was to show Jack the collar of one of the missing members of the team, and by force or persuasion, he would bring him into camp.

Among his dogs, Mr. Young had one which was so white it could very easily conceal itself in the snow. One day, the Indians, annoyed at the trouble which the dog caused, rubbed some coal-dust so thoroughly into his coat that for weeks he could easily be found. From that time he never again attempted his old tricks.

There seems to be something human about these dogs who are the constant companions of men.

Mr. Young relates the story of a dog who constituted himself the surgeon-doctor of all the other dogs. The instant a dog was unharnessed, this fine animal would overhaul him and would thus quickly find the galled or wounded spots. Very gently then he would lick them, and if, at first, a dog patient should resent his interference, he would simply lie down at the feet of the dog and wait for his anger to pass, and then get up, and begin his cleansing of the wound.

AN ILLUSTRIOUS WORKER DEAD

The Sudden Death of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the Founder of the West London Mission

BY the death of Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the city of London loses one of its most forceful and aggressive Christian workers, and the Methodist cause so much was hoped from his future labors. He had done so much that was successful, had devised so many ways of adapting Christianity to the needs of modern life, and had made the Church so thoroughly the friend and helper of people who need practical service, that there seemed to be a boundless field of usefulness open before him. At the age of fifty-five years, when all the ripe experience of an active and vigorous life had enriched his powers, he is suddenly cut down. It is hard to understand such a providence, but God knows best what is best for the worker and the work, and his will is our law.

Mr. Hughes was well known on this side the Atlantic. He came here as a delegate to the Ecumenical Conference in 1891, and made many friends by his frank, clear-sighted and generous spirit. Many among us, too, had visited the institutions in London which he founded and maintained, and had seen how his personality animated them and gave them energy and potentiality. It is probable that the whole-souled absorption that characterized all his work exhausted his physical vitality. He put his life into the enterprises he undertook, and he has paid the penalty that always menaces the strenuous worker who loses sight of himself in his work. So it is that the building of Christ's church in the world goes on. The brightest stones in the glorious edifice are the lives voluntarily laid down in the spirit of Him who died that other men might have eternal life.

The English Wesleyan church is indebted, under God, to an American preacher for its distinguished leader. Mr. Hughes, when a boy of thirteen, was at school in Carmarthen, Wales, his birth-place, when an American minister, spending his vacation in that beautiful town, preached for the local Wesleyan pastor. It was a thrilling discourse, that went home to the boy's heart. His future was settled. When he had completed his education he offered himself to the Wesleyan Conference, and was accepted. His pulpit power was so marked, even during his studies, that his appointments after his ordination were all to important spheres of labor. He was sent to Dover, Brighton, East Dulwich, Brixton and Oxford, and at each place the church prospered under his labors.

During his work at Brixton, a chaplain visited the church whose family was prominent in the social life of the most aristocratic section of the great city. He described conditions there, and showed how both the wealthy and the poor who rubbed elbows in the streets of the West End were living in practical heathenism. There was besides, in that section, he said, a vicious element which pandered to the evil propensities of young aristocrats, suffering and doing evil. Mr. Hughes was deeply impressed by the story. He presented it to the Conference, and obtained permission to open a mission in Piccadilly, which is the heart of clubland, where vice and misery are in close association with wealth and fashion. The mission did a wonderful work. Halls were opened in other quarters of the district, and the converts multiplied. Mr. Hughes had found his vocation. He carefully considered the peculiarities of every class, and opened halls to suit their special needs. The late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon took a deep interest in the work, and, busy as he was, lent himself to aid in its development. At first the work was largely experimental, but gradually it settled down to missions on four important thoroughfares, with five houses in adjacent districts in which rescue and preventive work was done.

Watchful over all, alert to seize opportunities of service, Mr. Hughes labored incessantly; even when his church honored him by making him President of the Conference, he found time to superintend the work. But at last human nature asserted itself. His health broke down. A prolonged period of rest was ordered. Mr. Hughes obeyed; but he was delighted when, at the end of it, he was allowed by his physicians to return to duty. On November 16 he preached with renewed vigor, and on the following day went out for a walk. On his return home, he sat down to rest, and almost instantly sank into unconsciousness. The summons from labor to reward had come, and in a short time he breathed his last.

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM XXIX.

The Thunderstorm Psalm

3. The voice of the Lord is upon the waters; the God of glory thundereth: the Lord is upon many waters.

"UPON MANY WATERS"

4. The voice of the Lord is powerful; the voice of the Lord is full of majesty.

5. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars; yea, the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

Amidst the babbling of a queer world, it is strangely sweet to hear "the voice of the Lord," even in the storm. This Psalm hushes the pipings of men and gives the ear sounds that are majestic and powerful. Speak Lord, in the whisper of silence to the soul, or in the tones of whirlwind, hurricane, and thunderstorm. One word of the Almighty is worth all that man can say.

PSALM XXX

The Psalm of Gladness

4. Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

"SING UNTO THE LORD"

5. For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favor is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

Mourner in Zion, listen! "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Here is a Psalm of gladness where one testifies: "Thou hast turned my mourning into dancing." "Thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness."

Our God is no respecter of persons, he will do the same for thee.

The Strange Providence Psalm

9. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am in trouble: mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly.

"MY STRENGTH FAILETH"

10. For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing: my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed.

The world is not only full of queer folk but of queer happenings — altogether strange, when it falls out that one is not only in trouble, but consumed with grief in soul and body, the years spent in sighing, strength gone, bones consumed, "forgotten as one dead and pitched out like a broken vessel," with slander added to it all. When strange providence like all this happens, it's time to read Psalm thirty-one day and night.

PSALM XXXII

The Instruction Psalm

8. I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go; I will guide thee with mine eye.

"I WILL TEACH THEE"

To many, this Psalm and the fifty-first are the two sweetest in all the one hundred and fifty. Certainly verses 1, 2 and 8, if really true to any man or woman, lifts them to a height of presence from which Beulah land can be seen. It is Paradise regained before the gates of Pearl swing to let the Saint come home. When sin is gone—all gone from life and heart by the Blood and Spirit, then will come all that is promised in the "Rest Chapter," Hebrews 4.

did not see an automobile; was knocked down, the right leg was broken and he was hurt internally. Such things are occurring every day. But have courage. The doctor thinks he will pull through. Be brave."

When Helen saw the white face on the pillow, white as death; saw her strong husband lying there apparently at the last gasp, she felt as if the ground were slipping away from under her feet. The nurse watched her keenly. But the wife did not break down. Jack's eyes entreated her. She bent to him; he whispered, oh! so softly, word by word:

"Darling—forgive—what—I—said—I did—not—mean—that."

"Oh, never mind Jack, never mind, only get well, only live!" she cried, kissing him with angelic tenderness. Her whole heart went out to him longingly.

"Of course he will live, Madam," said a gruff voice, and the doctor cut the visit short. "You may see him again this afternoon. Now I must fight the fever that is creeping on this patient, so you leave him to me for awhile."

Six weeks later, Jack Stimson, the mere wraith of what he had been, hobbled in on crutches, and took his old place in his own home. An idle word! It had come near being a true one; the wife had come near widowhood, the children had been almost made fatherless.

But Jack Stimson returned to a different home. Helen fought her little faults, like the true woman and wife that at bottom she was, and though the battle often went against her, she conquered in the end. Love triumphed, and the Stimson home became a place of dignity and contentment.

Went to Scoff, Remained to Praise

DURING Mr. Moody's first visit to Chicago, some twenty years ago (writes Dr. J. W. Brouger in The Institute Tie, issued by the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago), a noted Jewish photographer, George B. Rieman, wrote to the evangelist, asking him to appoint a sitting for his picture. Mr. Moody wrote him in reply that he appreciated the offer, but that he did not come to San Francisco to have his picture taken but to save his (Mr. Rieman's) soul. This made Mr. Rieman furious. The meetings went on. Great crowds attended. Many were converted. Every day the photographer read these announcements, and got madder and madder. He also became more and more curious to see and hear this wonderful man. One morning the newspapers proclaimed in glaring type the last day of the Moody meetings. Mr. Rieman made up his mind he must see this man Moody before he left the city. He went with his wife. They listened to the sermon, were interested, but not impressed. When the after-meeting was announced, Mr. Rieman said to his wife: "Well, we have been to the circus; let us go into the sideshow also." They went into the inquiry room, and there two earnest Christian workers met them and talked to them about Christ. They knelt and prayed, and before they left the service both were happily converted. Mr. Rieman became a Christian worker immediately, joined the church, studied for the ministry and became one of the most earnest Baptist preachers on the Pacific coast. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him, and went home to his reward a few years ago.

Our Children's Temple

LETTERS received at this office show that many kindly friends wish to share in the pious task of providing a children's temple at Mont-Lawn. Since the story was told in these columns of the wonderful good accomplished in the old, weather-beaten chapel, which cannot last much longer, and which is wholly inadequate in size to the congregations crowding into it each summer as our work grows, readers of this journal have voiced their sympathy with the wee worshippers and their approval of our purpose to erect a new and commodious Lord's House at Mont-Lawn. Of the two thousand tenement waifs annually entertained at our Children's Home, many are, when first received, little better than the heathen. Thousands now attending Sunday Schools in this city, learned at Mont-Lawn their first prayer and their first Bible verses. Children learn there to love Gospel songs and prayer, to welcome the ringing of the bell that summons them to their own house of worship. One day, when there had been so many visitors and so much play, that the Housemother thought little folks were too tired and sleepy for evensong, she said to the long line drawn up in front of the main building that they would be excused from attendance at worship that evening. A small street Arab looking up anxiously at his teacher, said: "Ain't we goin' to have any chapel to-night?"

"No!"

"Well," he exclaimed indignantly, "I call that a skin!"

One of the kitchen boys, towel in hand, heard the news and ran forward.

"Ain't we going to have chapel?" he asked the writer.

"No."

"Ain't that a shame!"

It was a matter of regret to all the workers last summer that the chapel could not hold all the children wanting to attend service. Shall we turn little seekers of the Truth away from the Lord's House next summer? Who will help us to answer that question, "No"? Kind words like these show that there is good hope that our little folks will have a joyous surprise next summer in finding a big chapel ready for them at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home:

B. W., Chillicothe, Ill. The story of Joe, "Little 15,000," who learned to sing hymns, instead of street-songs, at Mont-Lawn, touched an old man's heart. The orphan boy's life recalled visions of long ago, when the writer was left a fatherless lad of five. In thankfulness for a praying mother, who saved me from the perils that threatened Joe, and from which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home helped to rescue him, I enclose $5 to help build a "Children's Temple" at Mont-Lawn. I wish I could make it $5,000; and I shall pray that those who can will do this.—E. B. B., Liberty Grove, Wis., $1, to help build a Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn. Our school is very small; we would like to do more.—Mr. and Mrs. C. B., Lancaster, N. Y., $10 towards building a chapel at Mont-Lawn.—"For the Master," Burlington, N. Y., $10, to help build a temple at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn.—Mrs. A. M. B., Linwood, N. Y., $3, for the Children's Temple. I hope many more will send their mites.

MISSIONARIES SAIL FOR AFRICA

ON November 15, three young women set out from New York upon a journey of ten thousand miles. They sailed on the Hamburg-American liner, Bluecher. After a short stay in Hamburg they will again set sail on December 3 for Mombasa, British East Africa. They are scheduled to arrive there about January 15. From Mombasa the party will travel five others last fall from New York. Mr. Hurlburt was formerly State Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., of Pennsylvania.

The three ladies, who are now en route to their far-distant sphere of service, are Miss Anna D. Compton, of Troy, Pa., and the Misses Clara S. and Jean D. Fowler, of Philadelphia. Miss Compton was, for some time, a student in the Pennsylvania Bible Institute, and after her course of training there, she was for a number of years successfully engaged in pioneer work among the lumbermen of north-western Pennsylvania. Miss Clara Fowler has been engaged for the past year, as a graduate nurse in Philadelphia, and it is expected that her professional training will prove of value in ministering to the sick and suffering African natives. Miss Jean Fowler has been active in home-mission work among the children of the slums of her own city. She has also organized and established a Sunday School for colored children. She goes to Africa to take full charge of the native children now under the sheltering care of the Mission at Kangundo, most of them famine orphans.

These workers go forth without any guaranteed salary. The Mission is supported wholly by voluntary offerings, and no worker is promised any sum. Funds are forwarded as received by the Home Council in Philadelphia. Any information concerning the work will be cheerfully furnished by the Secretary, Mr. J. Davis Adams, 5930 Thompson st., Philadelphia, or by Pastor Cornelius Woelfkin, 188 Van Buren st., Brooklyn.

MISSSES CLARA AND JEAN FOWLER AND MISS ANNIE COMPTON

inland via the Uganda Railway, three hundred miles, stopping at Nairobi. From the latter station, their journey will be made afoot to Kangundo, a distance of forty miles. The Africa Inland Mission has a work started at that point, as a centre, and now under the direction of Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt, who sailed with

FAREWELL TO BISHOP THOBURN

THE recent farewell meeting in the Metropolitan Temple, New York, to Bishop James M. Thoburn on the eve of his return to India, was well attended. Rev. Dr. Warren L. Hoagland presided. Rev. Dr. Janewell led the opening prayer. There were several eloquent addresses, one of the most interesting being that of the venerable Bishop Andrews, who gave a vivid picture of India as he saw it twenty-five years ago, when preachers and missionaries were few and far between, and converts not many. He contrasted the conditions in India on the occasion of Bishop Thoburn's first journey there years ago and as they are now, when the Methodist Church alone numbers over 80,000 members among this strange and interesting people of the Orient, who, through trials of war and famine, have been brought to the place where they are eager to learn of Christ. Bishop Thoburn's long and faithful service in India was commended, and he was bidden God-speed on his voyage thither. Comment was made on the fact that the Church and the American public are sustaining Christian work in that country as never before. Bishop Thoburn, in his response, dwelt upon the fact that all India is asking, "Show us how to become Christians." In every corner of the land that cry is heard. Humiliation and famine have brought even high-caste Hindus—the proudest, most reserved people on earth—to the point where they wish to know of Jesus, whose followers minister relief and teach a faith so much more cheering and helpful than their own. Rev. W. F. Olden also commented on the wonderful wave towards Christianity passing over India, and of the generous impulses here towards that country. He said India was worthy of all that was being done for her. He congratulated Bishop Thoburn on his return to labor among so noble and appreciative a people as these Aryan races, who are our own kin. "They are a splendid people," he said, "a passionately religious, deeply philosophical people. Great saints and great apostles are to come out of India when India comes to Christ." When Rev. Dr. Bagnell, pastor of the Metropolitan Temple, had pronounced benediction, many friends crowded around Bishop Thoburn, bidding him good-bye and God-speed.

Led His Schoolmates to Christ

MR. J. B. CULLEN, a reader in Crisfield, Md., sends us this interesting experience: I have been reading in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an article on the conversion of children. I would like to give you a child's experience. Near fifty years ago a glorious revival began in our Methodist Church. While sinners flocked to the altar, I, a little boy, felt my need of a Saviour. I went to the altar, my father taking me to a place where I would not get hurt, and my mother sat by me. It was not long before I was converted, and, though the devil told me I had no religion, yet he has never told me I was not converted. I then went for my schoolmates and they began to seek the Lord, and since that time we have had scores of children converted. Many at that time did not approve of children going to the altar; but we worked on and now there is not one voice against it. We have seven children of our own, all converted when young. Two have been called over the river and are watching for our coming. I never see or hear of the conversion of children without recalling that old Methodist altar where I was converted when a little boy. I have never been able to tell half the joy of that hour. I shall soon be called home, but I bless the day I went to that altar to seek the Saviour's love. He has been with me in trouble and temptation, in sorrow and affliction. He has never left me alone. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and save the children.

Training the Armenian Orphans

Miss Corinna Shattuck, the well-known American missionary at Oorfa, Asia Minor, writes of her Armenian orphanage work: "I wish to give you a letter about your children more fully than possible now. Some are doing well in school, some at trades, some yet remain with us. We are pushing these yet with us in manual work, as we could not the earlier ones. An iron-working shop has recently been opened in addition to the cabinet-making, shoemaking, weaving and tailoring, being learned by over twenty now in the home. We utilize native talent as far as possible."

dashed blindly into the swamps and mires of La Salle and Karl Marx—and became avowed opponents of God and society. But they are an inconsiderable number, and the few of them seen to-day in the cafes of the Ghetto, move one's heart with pity.

For the old Jew, fresh from Europe, the new conditions he finds in America are strange indeed. He finds a strange people, a strange tongue. Even his own brethren are strange to him—they are more material, less spiritual than he. Stern old defender of the faith, he shakes his head sadly over the abominations that have crept into the body of Israel in this trefene medinah (unclean land). The brethren he found here, aye, even his own flesh and blood, had no time for morning, afternoon and evening prayers, blessings over the first bite of bread, or grace after meals—not to speak of recitations of the psalms, and an hour or two over a page of the Talmud. Why, even the Sabbath was desecrated by toil and business. Everything had gone wrong here—the old faith was threatened. Even the children were so much occupied with secular learning that they, too, had very little time for cheder (religious school), and the performance of religious rites. No wonder that he sighed for "home"—the land he had been so glad to flee from. Despite persecution, despite brutality, despite all the depressing conditions under which he had lived, it was still "home" to him. There he had been master—here his authority was practically disregarded; there he had been a respected member of the community—here, a nonentity!

If not too old, this newcomer insisted upon maintaining himself. He did not wish to be a burden on the shoulders of his children, who had manifested their love by bringing him here to share their lot. But usually his plans were opposed. The fifth commandment is graven deep into every Jewish heart. The sons and daughters would not hear of the old man earning his bread by the sweat of his brow. They were willing to make sacrifices of their own comfort, that their aged parents might spend their last days resting from the struggles, the labors and the cares of a life-time.

Sometimes a compromise would be effected. He might become a melamed (teacher), imparting instruction in Hebrew and religion to schoolboys. If he had a wide acquaintance, he established a cheder (school), otherwise, he called at the homes of his pupils, instructing them individually. Seemingly, an easy undertaking for the venerable Hebrew melamed was, in fact, an additional dreg in his already overflowing cup of bitterness. The boys had become accustomed to well-ventilated, well-lighted classrooms; a sweet-faced, tidy, and trained pedagogue. The primitive methods of this self-created instructor, to whom "methods" were unknown and who taught by rote, did not appeal to the schoolboy mind. Nor did the outlandish dress and evidences of personal neglect impress them favorably.

Whenever the old man had leisure he wended his way to the synagogue to pore over his beloved old tomes, in company with other old friends from "home," to bewail the decadence of men and the faith in this trefene medinah, where even the Sabbath was desecrated.

The Zionist cause spread like wildfire through the Ghetto, attracting old and young alike. Young men and young women who were beginning to drift down the tide away from the faith, hastened back. It became a grand Jewish rally. With the advent of the judenstaat idea, the triumph of the old man of the Ghetto began. His spirit, so long depressed, became buoyant, his eyes, so long downcast, looked up, and the sighs gave way to smiles. The Zionist rally drew the young people closer to him. They began to listen to his voice—they wanted to hear him speak. There dawned upon them a realization of the nobility of his life, of the grandeur of his purpose. They recalled his sacrifices for the faith, his martyrdom, and the love that had laid dormant in their breasts, demonstrated itself until it drove the frowns away and silenced the sighs. And they have determined to be near him and with him always.

The learned old man of the Ghetto is at the beginning of his triumph. He is surrounded with loving-kindness; on all sides there is Jewish endeavor and activity. In the Beth Hamidrash, or at home, the old man still pores over his beloved Talmud, over those tomes which were his solace and his shield during the centuries of oppression, persecution and martyrdom. His mind reverts to the terrible things that he suffered for his faith, and a sigh breaks from his lips. He raises his head—he looks around—he sees his children and grandchildren, solicitous for his well-being. He hears his beloved tongue spoken on all sides. His eyes alight on the synagogue across the street. He sees others like himself entering the house of worship. In a little while he will join them. And in the prayers that he will utter, there will be a note of thanksgiving—for, after all, everything is for the best in this new home of his, and God does rule over all.

Mr. A. H. Fromenson, the author of this article, is editor of the English Department of The Jewish Daily News and of The Jewish Gazette, both of New York.

For a Little Boy

I am delighted with The Speaking Oak. I wanted it for a Christmas gift to a dear, bright little boy, and since I have looked it over I have decided that I know of nothing to excel its fitness and value for that purpose. It is a wonderful compilation, and affords an education in itself. I was pleased when I came across the sketch of General Palma. I spent the summer half way up the mountain mentioned, and I enjoyed passing the general's home. I visited there, in the "office," spoken of, sitting in his chair I sipped coffee, and looked around at the furniture which will go to Cuba this coming year. I heard that in this room plans for Cuba's freedom were thought out. I could not help but admire the spirit of self-denial which influenced the general to give up a comfortable home in the States and devote his years to his native island at his time of life. Thank you again for the premium, and for the weekly delight that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is to me.

New York City.

LAURA B. BANKS.

Called Higher

In the death of Hiram Augustus Carson, of Linden, Pa., a young man who followed Christ on earth went to be with him above. His beautiful life and character are a rich legacy to those who loved him. He was very charitable, supplying the needs of others being his chief joy. For a number of years he had been in failing health, but as long as his strength permitted, he was found in his place at his beloved church.

Jeanette Kilborn Davis passed quietly into life in Boston, Mass., May 8, 1902, in the fifty-seventh year of her age. A recent letter from her husband, says: "She was a good and faithful friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and was interested in all its good works. She was the means of introducing it as a counselor and comforter into many homes." For eleven years past, Mrs. Davis had interested herself greatly in work among the Chinese in Boston, and during her last illness, their love and gratitude was evidenced by many tributes of fruits and flowers; and some came to her bed to pray in her behalf to that Lord and Master whose messenger she had been to them.

NEED TEETH.

Serious Failure of Body Comes from Lack of a Good Grinding Mill.

"A few years ago Mother had her teeth all taken out, hoping in that way to relieve her suffering, but failed, and it left her gums so sensitive that the wearing of false teeth or the proper mastication of food were equally impossible, so that in the Spring of 1901 she failed rapidly, mind and body both giving way and for many weeks life and reason were despaired of.

At one call of her physician he said she absolutely must take more nourishment, something easily digested, 'try Grape-Nuts.' I immediately obtained a package, prepared some with good, rich cream, and fed her from a teaspoon. She began to take it regularly and liked the food so well she would ask between times if we had any ready for her. She began to improve at once.

It is now three months since she began eating the food. She has fully recovered her health, looks better and is fleshier and stronger mentally and physically, than for many months previous.

Grape-Nuts furnished the nourishment for her that it seemed impossible to get from any other kind of food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

He Earns 2¢ a Minute

ABOUT four thousand boys are making money every week by selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST Friday afternoon and Saturday morning. If every other boy realized how easy it is, we would have more applications for agencies than we could appoint. One boy sold five copies in five minutes. Another boy sold seven hundred copies in a few days. Some boys are making $10.00 to $15.00 a week regularly. Every boy can start a bank account by this plan.

IT IS EASY TO SELL

The Saturday Evening Post

Your neighbors and friends will be glad to take it after they know you are our special representative. We will start any boy to work at once. No money needed. GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Uncle Hank in Washington

MANY books, grave and otherwise, have been written about Washington, but it is doubtful whether any that has yet appeared has gotten quite as much amusement out of the subject as Around the Capital with Uncle Hank, by Thomas Fleming, the well-known artist-author. Those who recall Mr. Fleming's book on the Pan-American will not be surprised to find that he has an equally attractive field for his innocent waggery and wholesome jocosities among the nation's statesmen and their surroundings. Uncle Hank is just as prankish as ever, and the record of his Washington adventures will while away many a pleasant hour wherever his story is read. He makes friends with everybody, of course, even with the highest officials. Cabinet circles, diplomats quarters, even the President's rooms, open to him, just as though they were the humblest grade of officials. Senators, representatives and Army and Navy officials he meets on familiar terms, and has "lots of fun" with them all. Moreover, the fun is good and wholesome, with never a pinch of partisanship or malice. Next to a real visit to Washington, there are few better substitutes than Uncle Hank's book. Three hundred and forty-six pages, copiously illustrated by the author, half Russia binding, topgilt. Price, $5.00. The Nutshell Publishing Company, New York, publishers.

A Harmless Revolution

A Harmless Revolution; or, a Well-known Family in Trouble. By Grace Miller White. Illustrated by J. K. Bryans. This unique little volume tells of the upheaval which broke out spontaneously in the Punctuation family, and which is described in all its comical ramifications. In the guise of a pleasant little story, an excellent lesson is inculcated, and it is one that is very likely to remain fixed in the mind of the reader. The novel pictures support well the interest of the letter-press. Pp. 38. Cloth bound, 50c.; paper covers, 25c. Grace Miller White, 35 West Twenty-first street, New York.

BOOKS RECEIVED

A Message to the Magians; studies upon the story of the Nativity; by Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage. In five picturesque chapters, Dr. Talmage presents the various scenes and incidents that cluster around the Manger of Bethlehem. It is a book which should be read with appreciation, and will carry the reader into many a channel of pleasant and profitable thought: 101 pages; cloth binding. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, London and Toronto, publishers.

Islam and Christianity; or, the Koran and the Bible. A Letter to a Moslem Friend, by a missionary. To all who are interested in the history of religions, and especially in the progress of Christianity, this book will have a peculiar interest. It reveals many facts concerning Mohammedanism that are not generally known, and some of them will doubtless be a surprise to many readers. The "sacred book" of the Moslems is shown to be a mass of self-contradictions, and the spurious pretensions of the most learned disciples of Mohammedanism are fully exposed. Pp. 225; cloth binding, $1. American Tract Society, New York, publishers.

Wasps and Their Ways, by Margaret W. Mosley, author of The Honeybees and Bee People. In reading this book, one is astonished at the amount of interest that can be aroused in a mere wasp. The chapters show how wasps hear without ears, smell without noses, converse without tongues. Wasp architecture is certainly remarkable as here described, and the section devoted to the uses of wasps and nests may be of practical help to housewives. The book relates also many things of interest about the intelligence of wasps, and superstitions where they are concerned. Pp. 316, cloth, illustrated. Price $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., publishers, New York.

We have received an artistic little book entitled Souvenir Summer Sermons, preached in Tent Evangel during the Summer of 1902. The sermons number twelve, the preachers being Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., London, England; Rev. P. S. Henson, D.D.; Rev. D. D. McLaurin, D.D.; Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.; Rev. Wilton Merle Smith, D.D.; Rev. John Balcolm Shaw, D.D.; Rev. George C. Lorimer, D.D.; Rev. W. Charles Stenson, D.D.; Rev. E. C. Chivers, D.D.; Robert E. Speer; Rev. Charles L. Mead; and Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, London, England. These sermons are all the more interesting, from the fact that the gospel work of the tent Evangel is widely known, and the preachers who aided the work include some of the most distinguished names in American and British pulpits. Published by Francis E. Fitch, 47 Broad Street, New York City. Price, Twenty-five cents.

The "Joy of the House"

A mother writes: "The Speaking Oak is the joy of our house. The children are having a happy time over the stories, which they read aloud by turns every evening. Tommy and Kate have already made good use of some of the incidents at their literary club, where everybody is expected to tell a short, brief anecdote on 'story night.' This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

A Holiday Gift FREE!

The Fairy Plate Calendar for 1903 is one of the choicest gifts which could be offered for the holidays. It is indeed the most unique and artistic calendar of the year. There are four different plates, each lithographic reproductions as above of Royal Vienna China in 12 colors and gold, with the center counter sunk and the borders embossed, and all this beauty emphasized with magnificent heads by Ryland, the English portrait painter. Each 9 1/2 inches in diameter. We will send calendar free to any one who will forward full name and address with ten Oval Fairy Box Fronts or ten two-cent stamps.

We prefer to receive the Fairy Box Fronts and in this way the calendar costs you nothing. Fairy Soap is the purest, and handiest that money can buy, although its price is but 5c. "Fits every hand; fit for any hand."

Whitefield's Traveling Pulpit

AN interesting relic of George Whitefield, the founder of the Calvinistic branch of the Methodists, is at present on exhibition in New York City. This is the very pulpit which, two hundred years ago, he carried with him in England, as he moved about the country to address the thousands who flocked to hear him preach. It is more than probable that he brought it with him, on some of his seven visits to this country, as he was often denied the use of regularly assigned pulpits on account of his evangelical ideas. It is a frail affair, and being made to fold up so that it could easily be carried by a strong man or on a wagon, thereabout it, as might be supposed, a number of hasps, hooks and hinges. As you examine the pulpit, you notice that it bears the marks of some severe treatment, and upon the upper railing you can see where the heavy hand of the preacher has fallen in giving emphasis to his vigorous exhortations.

It has been said that none have ever approached Whitefield as a pulpit orator. Many have surpassed him in making sermons, many have outshone him in the clearness of their logic, the grandeur of their conceptions and the sparkling beauty of single sentences; but in the power of darting the Gospel direct into the conscience, he eclipsed them all. On one occasion, Lord Chesterfield was listening to a sermon of Whitefield's, when he described the sinner under the character of a blind beggar, led by a little dog. The dog escaped, from some cause, and the beggar was left to grope his way guided only by his staff. Unconsciously he wanders to the edge of a precipice; his staff drops from his hand, down the abyss, too far to send back an echo; he reaches forward cautiously to recover it; for a moment he poises on vacancy, and—"Oh, God!" shouted Chesterfield, "he is gone," as he sprang from his seat to prevent the catastrophe. Such was the effective climax of Whitefield's oratory.

High Appreciation from Illinois

216 WISCONSIN AVENUE, OAK PARK, ILL., November 14.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—It affords me pleasure, on behalf of the entire family, to renew for about the twelfth consecutive year, my subscription for your sterling weekly, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To us your publication is par excellence in comparison with any other paper of its class published in America; for thoughtful and practical editorials, for large and interesting reports of current national and international conventions of Christians, for able and timely discussion of living topics in the spirit of Christian fairness and charity, for the generous and hearty support given every movement looking to the relief of the poor and the oppressed, as well as the sending abroad of the grand old Message of the Gospel of Jesus Christ and salvation through his name. It is a pleasure to us to say a good word for your paper, and you can count on us as subscribers indefinitely. J. C. ROUZER.

A Gift for a Youth

Do you want to present your growing boy a book that will at once interest and instruct? You could not choose better than the Hall of Fame. While the book is excellent reading for adults, it is not above the comprehension of boys, who will find most interesting chapters in it. The sketches are not merely dry historical data, they are replete with anecdote and incident. There is, for instance, Washington's letter telling his playmates about his new story-book, in which he can "read three or four pages without missing a word"; again, Robert Fulton's schoolmaster gives his opinion of Robert's head; Daniel Webster's father tells what he thinks about his son; Chief Justice Marshall strolls along the street eating cherries; and so on; the accomplishments of a man as a statesman, warrior, inventor, author never absorbing attention to the exclusion of his homely, everyday character or his ways in boyhood's days. This book, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, two dollars.

Her Choice Before All Others

Dear Christian Herald:—Your premium was duly received. I am very much pleased with the Bible and paper. I could not do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Manchester, N. H. MRS. J. M. HOWE.

COFFEE DID IT.

Put a Man Out of the Race.

Coffee serves some people in a most atrocious manner.

"I was a veritable coffee fiend, until finally my stomach rebelled at the treatment and failed to work," writes a gentleman from New York.

"I had dyspepsia in its worst form; blind, staggering headaches with vertigo about a half hour after each time I ate, and I finally grew so weak and became so thin that my mother advised me to stop coffee and try Postum Food Coffee.

I did not like it at first, but after experimenting in making it, Mother soon got it just right, and I then liked it better than coffee. I soon noticed my biliousness stopped and I lost the trembling effect on my nerves; Postum did not stimulate me but seemed to exhilarate. I gradually regained my wonted good health; my old appetite returned, and to-day I am well—dyspepsia, headache and vertigo all gone, and Postum did it.

When I began its use, I had been troubled for two years with all kinds of stomach trouble. I became a veritable walking apothecary shop, but I have not taken a dose of medicine since I commenced using Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

CHRISTMAS AMONG THE SOUTHERN PINES

By MARTHA McCHESNEY BERRY

A LOG cabin, with its chimney of sticks and clay, in the midst of tall, gloomy pines. Tacked on the door is an old coon-skin, and a strong twine latch-key hangs invitingly out. Entering, you see "Kindle Friendship" in large, black letters on the mantel-board over a great log fire. Scattered over the rough plank floor are skins of deer, wild cat and red fox, while near the door hangs a long-handled gourd over the little cedar water-pail. From the round pine poles which serve as rafters, strings of red pepper and ears of bright yellow and red popcorn are hanging. Each corner of the room is decorated with bunches of cotton, and an immense hornet's nest is stuck over the tiny wooden window. In a dim corner is an old rose-wood melodeon, whose small keyboard has turned yellow with age.

Sitting on boxes, benches, and split-bottom chairs are thirty children, huddled around the fireplace, listening to stories. The blazing knots on the pine fire light up their eager faces as they hear the sweetest story of all—the "Old, Old Story" of the Holy Child who was born at Christmas time in a stable and lay in a manger. The thought that the Christ-child was poor—poor as themselves—how it burns into the hearts of these children, making them feel he is their very own.

"Marm 'lows thar hain't nobody pore as we 'uns," said one little lad.

When I spoke of how Christmas was celebrated in cities, Minty piped:

"I never seed one o' them thar Chrismus trees."

Bill said: "Pears like I hain't got nary nothing to give you 'uns' Chrismus tree, lessen hit mought be my bull-headed pup." It was his only treasure.

I had some money laid aside for a party-dress and had planned a gay holiday trip to Atlanta. This story-telling afternoon in the log cabin changed my arrangements. I told my little friends of the pine woods they should have a "sure-enough Christmas tree," and bade them come at two, Christmas afternoon.

When I went to the cabin at nine that blessed morning to put the final touches to the tree, I saw a procession of men, women, children, babies, dogs, oxcarts and mules in front of the cabin. I was panic-stricken to think I had to give presents to so many more than I had invited. The explanation came in words like these:

"We 'uns 'lowed we 'uns ought to send word over to Uncle Bill's house. 'Pears like they hain't never seed nary Chrismus tree; an' they 'lowed they'd come an' bring thar young 'uns; an' they 'lowed they'd git a mighty fine Chrismus present."

I rushed up to the house, emptied my bureau-drawer of ribbons and handkerchiefs; went to my brother's room and got all the handkerchiefs, ties, and other clothes I could find, and still I had not enough. I went down to the cabin again, and saw that more people had arrived. And still they were coming and coming. In desperation, I made another trip to the house, and searched mother's china-closet for stray cups and saucers and odds and ends of crockery. When I had exhausted the dining-room I appeared in the kitchen, but our old colored cook (who is quite an authoritative member of our family, having been with us thirty years) barred my progress, her face resolute, her arms akimbo:

lifetime to many in that room. One youngster, overcome by his pent-up feelings, burst into a great cry that Grandpa Dye said, "turned us all as deaf as posts."

The carol now began, and singing, the little children walked round and round the tree, their eyes fairly sparkling with rapture as they gazed at the lighted candles, the long loops of pop-corn, the gay dolls, the firecrackers, popguns and "heaps" of oranges and apples and bags of candy. Between stanzas there were such exclamations as, "O gimme that thar doll!" "The one in the pink dress is mine!" "Hit 'pears like I must git that doll. It's dress is sot on same ez a butterfly's wings!" "Hist me clean up, daddy, so we 'uns can see them thar blue and red tootin' horns!" One sixteen-year-old cried because she got a work-basket instead of a doll. Her "heart was plum broke."

"I ain't nuvver had nary doll in my life. I was jes sot on gittin' one," she said.

It was dark before we were able to persuade them to leave us. As I watched the little figures disappearing in the dim, piny woods, and looked back into the log cabin, and saw that the lights on the tree had all gone out, my heart yearned towards the children and sank at the thought of the hard lives they must lead; and then it grew glad and strong. I felt that lights had been kindled in their hearts that would never go out—that here, in this little cabin, they had learned to know something of Him whose coming to earth as a little child they had celebrated around their first Christmas Tree.

My face, as I beheld it in the mirror that night, was marked with soot, my hair was down, I was weary and unkempt. "Do you regret the party you didn't go to and the party dress you gave up, and all your ribbons and handkerchiefs gone?" my sister asked. "No," I answered, so tired I could cry. "This is the happiest Christmas I ever spent. Thank God for it!"

In my frequent visits to the homes of the piny woods people, some no larger than the "Christmas Tree Cabin," I had been welcome to the best they could set before me—if it were no more than a cake of corn-bread, for their spirit of hospitality is as broad as their means are narrow. I was thankful that they had honored me this Christmas by becoming my guests. Now, I have gone to live and work among them—they are my people. The land on which the log cabin stood (eighty acres, which my father gave me as a Christmas present when I was a little girl), became later my gift to my piny woods children. And a big schoolhouse stands on it. This Christmas we hope for a very happy time. The Christmas Tree

"I BEGAN TO PLAY FOR THEM TO SING THEIR CAROL."

"None o' my things for you to give away, missy. You kyarn't take nothin' out o' my kitchen."

She trotted upstairs to mother, and said: "Ole miss, we got to lock up our things f'om dis chile. She done gone plum 'stracted 'bout dat Chrismus tree."

I had taught the children a Christmas carol, and when two o'clock came I was seated at the little melodeon, which was so aged and infirm that three small assistants had to hold it up while I played. One of the countrymen was disguised as Santa Claus. He wore a mask-face we had provided and a long white beard. Cotton-lint was sewed all over his coat. A paper bag, decorated with cotton-balls, did duty as a hat. His clothes were so old they had turned green, but this hue, showing through the fleeces, enhanced the general effect of his appearance as one who had come through firs and pines from lands of everlasting snow. After lighting up the candles on the tree, I had bidden Santa run around it when we should open the door.

A light flickering of snow had fallen; the clouds were yet overcast and the pines looked dark and grim, but the throngs were waiting patiently.

When everything was ready, the door swung wide, a warm ruddy light streamed out, and the children fairly tumbled into the cabin. I began to play for them to sing their Christmas Carol according to programme. Small Jim was puffing and blowing as for dear life over the wheezy pedal, while Beadie's steady hand held the rod in its socket. But in vain the melodeon wheezed and wailed and cried its Christmas music; the children remained stock dumb. Looking back in surprise, I perceived that it was the wonderful Tree, reaching from floor to rafters, glowing with tapers, glittering with lights and tinsel, and loaded with gifts, that held them wide-eyed, open-mouthed, spellbound. Their first Christmas Tree! It was the revelation of a must be larger than ever, for a longer procession will come; they know they are sure of welcome and of all I can do for them—my golden-hearted children of the piny woods. Would that I could do more!

... SERMON BY...

Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, D.D.

Presbyterian Church, Chicago

The EMPTY CRADLE

ISAIAH 40: 11: — "He shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young."

WHAT does the "empty cradle" of this morning's theme mean? Does it mean that the babies who once played in our nurseries have grown up into big boys and girls, who rush away every morning from the breakfast-table to be in time to answer the call of the school bell? Does it mean that our children have become young men and women, and left the old homestead to go forth into the great battle of life? Oh, no! This morning I am going to preach upon the little white cradle which has been emptied, in order to fill up the little white casket. I am going to tell why Jesus, as the Good Shepherd, often comes into the homes and gathers the little lambs into his arms and carries them into the green pastures of heaven. We know he has always cared for them, as my text asserts, while they still remained with us upon earth, but not till they reach heaven can they realize his perfect love.

Did you ever stop to think that the vast majority of the human race die in childhood, and that over one-third die in infancy, before the fourth year has been reached? Only the other day, I preached a funeral sermon in the house of a dear friend, in which lay a little white casket. As I was looking into the face of the little boy, whom I had welcomed into the world, and whom I had also baptized, a sympathetic friend said: "Oh, Mr. Talmage, this is awfully hard to bear! I know what it means to have the Divine Gardener come and pluck the blossoms out of the nursery. I have had seven children during my life; six of them are dead. Only one boy is alive of them all." As I left that home of mourning, and stood upon the street waiting for the pall-bearers to place their precious burden in the white hearse, by conversation I found out that the two mothers who were then standing nearest to my side, each had two nurseries. The one nursery was for their living children within the four walls of the home. The second nursery was for their dead children, within the four sides of the family plot.

The Beckoning Hand

Now, my friends, what is the meaning of this wholesale emigration of our little ones to the heavenly shore? Is the life and the death of the majority of children a failure? Is the empty cradle so empty that it can hold for us no inspiring lesson of good cheer? Or is Christ to-day gathering the lambs into his arms and carrying them in his bosom, so that he can the more safely lead the bereaved parents along the thorny and dangerous pathways of an earthly journey, to the glorious destination prepared for them ahead? The marginal notes of my Bible affirm that this portion of my text may mean that the Good Shepherd may be carrying the little lambs in his bosom to the green pastures of heaven, so that the mother-sheep, with bleat and cry, will follow more anxiously and closely after the Divine Master. So to-day I preach to thousands of sorrowing hearts. I want to tell them why their dead children were born, and also why God does not let the vast majority of the human race grow old and with bedimmed eyesight, see the twilight of three-score years and ten.

The empty cradle can be the sacred hearthstone of a purified matrimonial love. It can be the holy covenant ark; the cherubim of which are made out of far more valuable material than those which were once moulded out of melted gold. These new cherubim may be the spiritual bodies of our redeemed children, who are hovering over us in perpetual benediction. It may be the trysting-place, where tired and care-worn men and women meet again to talk over the sweet memories of the past.

Some people do not believe this. They sceptically assert that a cradle, full or no, is a wedge which drives fathers and mothers apart, rather than a golden link of love which clasps parental heart to parental heart. Lately, a very dear family friend, who had been a wife for many years, but not a mother, told me that she really believed her husband and herself were more dependent upon each other, and therefore loved each other the more, because they had no children. I only laughed at her. "Why," I said, "when you attempt to talk that way, you are like a blind man feeling his way along the streets with a staff, going step by step, who thinks he is getting along all right, and who is attempting to prove that the sunlight is useless, merely because he has never seen a sunrise, or a sunset, having been born blind." Every true father knows that he never loved his wife as much the day before his first baby was born, as the day after. Every true father knows that the happiest moment of his life was not the day he held his bride's hand at the marriage altar, but the day that he could sit by his wife's bedside, and hold in his big hand a little tiny hand. This tiny hand he was awkwardly holding in great fear of letting it fall, lest it break into pieces, like a little cup of porcelain. And while he held this tiny hand in his, with happy look he would turn his loving eyes upon the smiling face of his wife, his baby's mother.

After the dark clouds of a nativity have for some time hovered over a home and at last parted to let a little human sunbeam drop into the cradle, the words "husband" and "wife" ought to have for at least two human hearts a deeper, wider, holier meaning. These words ought to have the same kind of a holy interpretation as one of them had a few years ago for the warden of the Pittsburg jail. His wife liberated the two Biddle Brothers, who were about to be executed for murder, and ran away with them, and stayed with them until they were shot. When the reporters came to this warden, and asked what he wanted to say in reference to his wife, the recollection of the relation she sustained to the family, deeply as she had dishonored it, seems to have surged over his soul, and he said: "I have nothing to say against my former wife. Furthermore, I will not allow any one in my presence to speak disrespectfully of her. Remember, gentlemen, she is the mother of my children."

Purified by Bereavement

Now, my sorrowing friends, if a living child can have such a purifying influence upon the parental heart, how much more should an empty cradle purify the love which the twain pledged each other at the marriage altar? We have often heard how old soldiers, who had slept under the same blanket, and fought side by side through the Civil War, cling to each other all through life, on account of their past sufferings. If this be true, is not your marital love purer and sweeter and truer because you have washed and cleansed it in the empty cradle, which has been filled to the highest edge with your mutual tears? After your little girl died, you hunted up all her old playmates and took them to your heart, because they loved Hattie, or Nellie, or Mabel. If that be true, tell me, O broken-hearted parents, did you not love each other with a deeper, wider, and holier affection, after you together nursed the little sufferer through that last long painful sickness? Do you not now love each other the more, after you together have arranged the little white flowers upon the little white casket? Do you not to-day love each other the more, because when those sad anniversaries of your baby's death come, you never mention her name, but give to each other a holy kiss, while your eyes and cheeks are wet with falling tears? Yes, your little dead child's life had a distinct mission. She lived long enough to make the twain one flesh. From her casket to-day, she reaches out one arm, and puts it about her father's neck. She reaches out the other arm, and puts it about the mother's neck. And now her dead lips part as she gives you this holy benediction: "Papa, mamma, be true to each other, and love each other for your dead baby's sake."

The Treasure City

An empty cradle is a potent magnet for a true, consecrated, spiritual, parental life. It makes a great deal of difference how an average father and mother feel toward heaven, whether or no they have a little one in the Spirit-land. "Where your treasure is, there is your heart also," can be interpreted in more ways than one. You have a boy who has started out to earn his own living. He has become the owner of a little shoe store, in one of the outlying districts of the city of Chicago. When you visit him and his young bride, does he take you the first day to see any of the great stores in the downtown districts? Does he want you, as soon as you arrive, to visit the noted art galleries, or the libraries, or the famous Auditorium, where the mightiest orators of the world have spoken, and the most beautiful voices of Europe and America have sung? Oh, no. The first place the boy takes you to is his own little store. Why his face beams with pride as he says: "Mother, just look at these show windows! Are they not splendid? Those windows cost me $300, but they are worth it. Then, mother, I intend as soon as the business increases enough to warrant it, to build an addition on the back of the store. Then, perhaps, I may be able to hire this corner store, and knock out the intervening walls. Then I shall run a line of furnishing goods, as well as a shoe store. Don't you think this is a fine situation? And, mother, I made all this myself out of nothing; out of the $50 you gave me when I left home." Why does your boy go on like that? Easy enough to understand. His treasure is in that store. There his heart is also.

What is true in reference to the business life, is true in reference to the home. You may travel all around the world. You may stand in a Louvre or a Luxembourg. You may wander through a Windsor Castle or a Vatican. You may even travel for a time among the poetic beauties of India or Ceylon. But when the evening hour comes, your thoughts will leap over continents and swim over seas; they will travel past palaces and cathedrals, and London Towers filled with crown jewels, until at last they enter some humble home, and smile, and laugh, and cry, by some cozy fireside. Why? Because your loved ones are in that home. And where your treasure is, there is your heart also.

Hostages of Righteousness

Now, by the same law of reasoning, God wants to make heaven a place, a practicality—no condition, but a veritable actuality. How is the Divine Father to do this? By taking us to heaven ourselves? Oh, no. God will not do this, because our work is not yet done. But God can make us feel that heaven is a place, by coming into our homes and taking away our dearest treasures to that place. What does he take? Our money? Sometimes. But generally something dearer and more precious than that. God as a loving Father takes the dearest possession we have. He takes a little child out of the nursery. He takes that for which a mother would give the diamond rings off her fingers, the silk dresses out of her wardrobe, the house over her head; for which she would give anything, and everything, if she could only get back her child. God, in love takes that little child out of the parental arms. He takes it as a hostage, as the great kings of old used to demand the sons and daughters of their defiant subjects, to be sent to the royal court as a guarantee that those subjects would thereafter behave themselves. God, when he comes into our nurseries and takes the little ones home with him to heaven, practically says to the bereft parents, "Father and mother, live purer and nobler and more consecrated lives. Live as Jesus would have you live. Then, some day you will come to the heavenly land, where you shall be able for ever and ever to dwell with your little ones." Does not this suggestion give to you an added force to the beautiful words, "And he shall gently lead those that are with young?"

Children in Heaven

An empty cradle signifies, in a general sense, a populous heaven. Some years ago I read a mathematician's figures in reference to the size of heaven, given according to the measurements of the prophetic vision. I have forgotten what those figures were, and would not give them, even if I could remember them. But this I do remember: The mathematician stated that if the world were to last a hundred thousand years, and if the human race could keep on doubling itself every few years, according to the Malthusian ratio, and if all children born would grow to maturity, and all those grown men and women would be ultimately saved, there would still be room enough in heaven for every immortal soul to have an immense palace all to himself and have immense grounds around that palace. Now, if heaven be such an immense place, how would it be possible for God to populate it, in any true sense of the word, unless he every year had a wholesale emigration to heaven of the little children? He surely could not depend entirely upon populating heaven from the old folks. God knows, and we also know, that all men and women can be saved who wish to be saved through the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ. But the trouble with the grown-up folks is that a vast percentage of us do not want to be saved. We firmly set our teeth and face toward sin. So I believe that God, in order to make sure of a populated heaven, has sent again, and again, and again the Angel of Eternal Life, which some of us gloomily call the Death Angel, to call our babies into the heavenly land.

That the Good Shepherd, both in this world and the next, gathers all the little lambs into his bosom, there is no doubt. Some years ago in a Newark church, an aged statesman applied to the session for permission to join. One of the elders immediately arose and said, "Governor, we were just about to examine two little girls for membership, but we know they will be willing to wait, so we can first begin with you." "No," answered the famous statesman, "I do not want them to wait. I would like to be examined along with them, if you, brethren, are willing. Jesus said, that if I will come to him in the spirit of a little child, I can be saved. So to-day I would like to come with one of the children upon one side of me, and the other upon the other side of me; for I know Christ is willing to receive them, and perhaps he will also look upon me as a child." Ah, yes, there is no doubt that all the children who die go to swell up the population of heaven. And so, O sorrowing parents, you should not only be ready to let your little babies climb into the Saviour's arms, because you know that they are all saved, but you should also be willing to let them precede you, because you know they will be in heaven, waiting there to welcome you.

An empty cradle signifies that heaven is to be a place filled with children. This heading is entirely distinct from that which we have discussed, namely, that our children who die, immediately go into glory. It is distinct, because many people—even some good professing Christians—seem to have a very hazy and bewildered idea of heaven. They think heaven is to be a kind of a tenement house district, or they suppose it to be a place where everybody goes through a kind of metamorphosis, and becomes so changed in looks and speech in a little while, that their very best friends would not know them if they should meet them when walking on one of the golden boulevards near to the beautiful gate. But thank God, we will know our loved ones in heaven. Moses and Elias, after having spent a thousand years in heaven, talked upon the Mount of Transfiguration, just the same as they talked to their friends when upon earth. We shall know Jesus in heaven by the scars upon his resurrected body, which he received upon the Cross in his earthly body. I believe our redeemed friends are to be just the same in heaven, in one sense, as they were when upon earth. I believe they are just the same, except that in the heavenly land they have no pain, no sickness, no sin, no parting, no death, no tears.

If there are no children in heaven, why did St. John in the Apocalypse cry out in rapture, "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God." Some of the most reliable of commentators have translated that passage, "And I saw the infants and adults stand before God." If there are no children in heaven, why did Jesus say that "In my Father's house are many mansions," or many homes? Did you ever see a place where there were a collection of many homes and no children? Heaven must be full of little ones. I once heard of a thief who was trying to escape from the officers of the law, by running through a public school yard. But the little children crowded around him, and got under his feet and tripped him up until he was captured. So, I believe some of us will have hard work to get into heaven. Why? Our departed and redeemed children, with their hosts of little friends, will come down to the pearly gates to greet us. They will crowd about us in such numbers that we will have hard work to press towards the white throne. Yes, we shall greet our dead and redeemed children. We shall greet them as children. We will kiss the same lips, and run our fingers through the same curls. We shall there have a celestial nursery. We shall also have a fragrant playground, in which our little lambs can frisk and frolic—in which our little departed children can gather for us the wild flowers, and garland our white robes with the red roses of Sharon, and with the lilies of the valley, blooming upon the banks of the River of Life.

An empty cradle signifies that God has his favorites, if I might reverently use that term. Oh, that I had more time in which to develop this inspiring and tremendous thought. By his favorites, I mean this: God has selected our redeemed children out of all the human race as the ones he wishes to save from suffering—as the ones who, by his tender love, are to win all the joys of heaven without any of the tears of Gethsemane.

Perhaps I can illustrate this idea in a very simple way. Supposing you were a man of great wealth; as you go up and down the world, your heart aches for the little bootblacks and newsboys whom you meet in the street, and who seemingly have no show in life. You were once a waif of the street, and you know what their temptations and struggles are. You endow a great institution, where these boys can have educational advantages and the comforts of a home. You cannot send all the boys there, because you have not money enough, but you can send some. So you go up and down the large cities, selecting here and there the brightest boys you can find. They are your favored bootblacks. You select the brightest, the most promising, and the most manly. Well, in the same way, I think, God has his favorites, and they are children who are dead and translated. When Christ thinks of all the temptations he had to meet on earth, and all the sorrows he endured, he resolves to relieve many of the burdens and he takes away chiefly those of whom he said, "Of such are the kingdom of heaven." So Christ comes into the world, and he selects the best and brightest of our children. Have you not noticed that the handsomest and the best boys and girls are, as a rule, the first to be called away? Well, Christ comes in and takes our best and purest, and lifts them up into his arms and says, "Ah, this lamb has too frail and beautiful a soul to be subjected to the buffetings of this world." Thus Christ took for awhile some of our little ones out of our sight. Ah, my dear friends, are you not glad that your dead babies are among God's favorites? Are you not glad that they do not have to suffer, as you have to suffer, and weep as you weep; stumble over the open graves as you stumble; sin as, perhaps, you have sinned? Are you not thankful that your little children in heaven are to be numbered among God's specially honored ones?

Thus my text to-day has a most practical and inspiring helpful message for all men and women who have sacred little graves in their family plots. I want you all to set your faces toward the heavenly land, where your beloved children are waiting for you. I want you truly to feel that Jesus the Good Shepherd has lifted the little lambs into his arms, and is carrying them in his bosom. Remember, the parting will not be long. Believe me, if you have faith in Jesus Christ, the reunion will surely come. And so I will close this sermon with the sweet consolation a little Philadelphia girl once gave to her aged grandmother, Mrs. William Harper, the widow of the noted pastor of the Broad Street Presbyterian Church. One day, sitting at the feet of her grandmother, this little girl looked up and said, "Grandmamma, do you miss grand-daddy? Well, never mind, I know he misses you. We will not be separated long, grandma. Perhaps you will go next; perhaps I. But it will not be long. And then, grandmamma, won't 'daddy' be glad to see us both?" No, bereaved parents, your separation from your little ones will not be long; if you only place your faith in Christ, and live for him. It will not be long. Perhaps you will be the next to go. Perhaps I. But when we are all together in heaven, will not your little ones be happy to greet us? But the parting will not be long. Sad hearts, it will not be long.

A CHANGE OF ALLEGIANCE

DISPUTES long pending between the people on the little group of islands off the coast of Honduras and the government of that country, have recently been settled by an act which has caused a sensation throughout the islands. In a letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from Mr. Richard H. Rose, of Utila, one of the Bay Islands, is a description of the consternation and disappointment which the people are now suffering. From his statement, we learn that a large number of the people on the islands discover that they are citizens of Honduras, whereas they imagined that they were subjects of Great Britain. The mistake had its origin in an arrangement made more than forty years ago. Prior to that time, the Bay Islands belonged to Great Britain; British subjects went there to trade and raise crops, and a British governor presided over the islands. But in 1850, the British Government ceded the islands to Honduras, and in 1861, the transfer was formally completed. It was supposed by the people of British origin, that they would retain their nationality; but the government of Honduras has insisted on claiming them as citizens of the republic. They thus became liable to military service and other duties, which are not required of foreigners. An appeal was consequently made to Great Britain for protection. The answer has arrived. The British war-ship Psyche, commanded by Captain Cooper-Key, brought a communication from the Government of Great Britain, to the effect that all British subjects who were on the islands when they were transferred, became citizens of Honduras, and they and their descendants owe allegiance to that republic. British subjects, however, who have settled on the islands since the transfer, retain their nationality, if they so desire.

A curious anomaly, probably due to the fact that the decision was pronounced by a sailor not by a lawyer, is the result of the decision. It is, that when the people whose allegiance is thus transferred to Honduras, leave the islands to reside elsewhere, they regain British citizenship. Another anomaly is that many of the people own, or serve on, trading vessels, which have British register, and hold British certificates. The question, therefore, arises, whether the man on board his British ship, carrying his British certificate, can by any logical argument be deemed a citizen of Honduras. Both these anomalies, which came to the surface when the Captain of the Psyche was questioned by the people concerned, will doubtless be straightened out by British statesmen, but in the meantime they must produce embarrassment. It is to the credit of the Government of Honduras that it has promised these discontented citizens fair treatment. The children are to be admitted to the public schools, and even to the High School at Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, and the men are eligible for election to the legislature of the republic, and the Governor of the Islands appointed by Honduras, assured the people that no effort would be spared to promote their peace, progress and material prosperity.

WOMEN OF UTILLA, DENATIONALIZED BY GREAT BRITAIN

A SCENE IN RUATAN, WHOSE PEOPLE ARE NO LONGER BRITISH SUBJECTS

HOW THE CITIZENS OF BAY ISLANDS BECAME CITIZENS OF HONDURAS...

The islands are named respectively Ruatan, Bonacco, Helene, Morat, Barburat and Utila. The people are industrious, intelligent and progressive. Many of them are expert seamen, and there are a large number of excellent carpenters and boat-builders. A large number, Mr. Rose says, "are devout Christians. Protestantism is represented in the islands by three different denominations—the Baptists, the Seventh Day Adventists, and the English Wesleyan Methodists.

"Many churches are scattered over the islands, and the glorious Gospel of the blessed God is being constantly proclaimed. The generous yearly contributions of the people to Foreign Missions is one of the tests of their devotedness to Christ and his cause. Another test, and a very practical one, is their service, which is most cheerfully rendered, in every branch of church work.

"I think that my old friend and fellow-worker, Mr. James Cooper, deserves special mention here. He is a Methodist local preacher in Utila, and he has been preaching almost every Sunday for more than forty years, and without pay. But heaven, the crown of righteousness, and 'well done,' from the Master, will be this faithful old man's sweet reward."

For Burden-Bearers

How many men and women ready to faint under the heat and burden of the day, have had their strength renewed by a word of cheer and good counsel, as found in a helpful story? In the guise of anecdotes, lifted cups of cordial have again and again been to lips athirst for spiritual refreshing. There are often times when the brain is so weary, the body so tired, the heart so sore that essays, sermons, advice in any form, have no meaning; yet a story, like a flower, like a song, may bring rest and comfort. "May be," says Rev. Dr. Iglehart, author of The Speaking Oak, and 301 Other Tales, "men and women immersed in the business or cares of this world may gain from these tales some added strength for burdens, courage for conflicts, and patience in perplexities; that they will turn their eyes from material plans to spiritual forces, from the accidents and incidents of life to the realities of the universe.

"Possibly the aged in reading these pages, may take new comfort in the bosom of loved ones, and have fresh vision of those who have gone before them to the better land."

££ ££ Pastor Zamora's Gospel Crusade in the Archipelago ££ ££ of great interest, so great that I am unable to express the joy of my heart over the attention which my brothers in Christ in your country are giving to the possibility of spreading more and more the kingdom of God in the Philippine Islands.

In my first letter, I expressed the need for many laborers for the Gospel here, because of the need in each and every island. In regard to the questions which you have asked, I beg to answer, point by point:

1. The least amount which is sufficient (while prices prevail as at present) to maintain Filipino evangelists in a respectable manner is twenty-five dollars ($25) per month, or three hundred dollars ($300) per year. In this amount are included all traveling expenses. In the provinces this amount would be sufficient. In Manila, however, it is not enough, for the rents, food, clothing, medicine, laundry, and other necessities. Life in the Philippines is at present very expensive, and must not be compared with that in China and India where everything is very cheap.

2. There are at present three evangelists helping me, one in Manila and two in Malabon.

3. You ask how many evangelists are needed here. I am not able to say, as the need is as great as the size of the sea!

4. You ask if there would be difficulty in securing the services of native evangelists, qualified to aid in the extension of evangelical effort in the towns distant from the centre of my labors. No, there would be no difficulty.

We have no need for Bibles in Spanish or in English. For three years, both the British and Foreign Bible Society and the American Bible Society have been circulating the Bible in those languages, and in translating and circulating Scriptures in the native languages. Both Bible societies have their colporteurs introducing the Bible in the towns and provinces of the whole archipelago. We have hymns in Tagalog and Pampanga, and hope to print more as soon as funds can be secured to print them. Spanish reaches but a limited number. English hymns might reach many, after a few more years of the government educational system. The great masses now must be reached in their own dialects. Hymns, in the dialects, with music, would be of great value. A good font of music type would enable the Evangelical Union to reach the hearts of multitudes. The Filipinos are a musical race, and congregational singing comes as a most welcome innovation from the Latin chants of the choir boys in the old Catholic churches. It is said that you have a proverb which reads, "Let me make a nation's songs, and I care not who makes its laws."

The denominations represented here are the Presbyterian, Baptist, United Brethren, Christian (Disciple), Methodist Episcopal and Episcopal. For purposes of harmony in effort the evangelical churches are united in an Evangelical Union. All use the name of Cristianos Evangelicos. The same hymns are used by all. The first purpose in the sermon of all is to make Christians. Denomination lines are maintained sufficiently to preserve organization and fellowship with the supporting bodies in America, but not to extent controversial effort. All energies are thrown upon Christ and him crucified, as the sole means of salvation. To avoid duplication of effort, the different provinces are assigned to the different missionary bodies represented. The work of the evangelists, as you mention is purely Gospel work. My desire is to select equal numbers from each evangelical branch of the church, in its widest sense, when sending them throughout the archipelago.

As you know, I am a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church... the only Filipino as yet ordained. The Malasia Annual Conference of 1902, appointed me evangelist for the Philippine Islands district.

It gives me pleasure to inform you that on the 23d of August, 1902, occurred the dedication of a new evangelical chapel at Atlag barrio, in the city of Malolos (formerly capital of the Aguinaldo government). The founder of the Malolos church is Donna Narzisa Dimagiba, a lady of three score years, who was converted in one of my services in Tondo. More than five hundred people assisted at the dedication, sixty-two were baptized, and about one hundred and fifty partook of the communion. Brother Don Louis Ocampo is pastor. On Oct. 5 took place the dedication of a chapel in the barrio of Yulong Duhal Malabon. Communion was administered to more than two hundred persons. It has been my privilege to inaugurate more chapels in this city—three in all. N. ZAMORA.

Pastor Zamora has already established Gospel stations at Paranaque, Malibay, Santa Cruz, Baucusay, Gagalangin, Aguilala, Camba, Paudacan, Pescadores, Santa Meza, Malabon, and Hagonoy. As early as June, last, 147 Gospel meetings had been held, with an average weekly attendance of 2,100. This is practically the result of the efforts of one man, who has organized this work among people who were nominal Catholics a little over a year ago. It has doubtless greatly increased since last midsummer.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites its readers to aid in the work of redeeming the Philippines. Any and all who are interested in the work should send their contributions to this journal, the money so raised to be used in placing Christian native workers in the field, opening new preaching stations and winning precious souls for Christ in the archipelago. All contributions to the Philippine Gospel Fund should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and every contribution will be duly acknowledged in these columns. The following have already been received:

THE NEW EVANGELICAL CHAPEL AT ATLAG, MALOLOS, P. I.

READERS of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar to some extent with the Gospel work which is now being conducted in the Philippine Islands, under the personal direction of the consecrated native pastor, the Rev. Nicolas Zamora. Pastor Zamora has been justly called the "Apostle of the Filipinos." In the face of great danger, amid tireless persecution, and often in privation and suffering, he has labored among his fellow-countrymen to win souls for the Master. Rich blessing has followed his ministry. His converts have multiplied, and many churches have sprung up in hitherto neglected fields where he has labored.

In a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presented to its readers the golden opportunity for a vigorous spiritual crusade in the Philippines. It has been demonstrated in many ways that the people are hungering for the Gospel. Since the downfall of the friars, the field open to evangelical effort has been vastly increased. It is the opportunity for Christian America to occupy that field with faithful, energetic workers. Providentially, Nicolas Zamora has been brought to the front as the man upon whose shoulders the organization and conduct of a native Christian work of this character may safely be placed.

In response to a letter of inquiry from the proprietor of this journal, Pastor Zamora has sent the following communication, which will interest all who have at heart the evangelization of the Philippines:

WHERE THE PRESIDENT WILL WORSHIP

GRACE Memorial Reformed Church (German Reform), where the President of the United States worships every Sunday that he is in Washington, and where he will listen to his Christmas sermon, stands on a quiet, restful spot, where the Sabbath calm is unbroken by the rattle of passing street cars and the treading of many feet along the thoroughfares. Mr. Roosevelt is a member of the Dutch Reform Church, and when he first came to Washington, he was in a quandary as to where he should attend service, as there is no church of his denomination in the city. The Rev. John M. Schick suggested to him that there was a modest little chapel within a short distance of the White House gate, and the President went there the next Sunday. He has been going there ever since. Now the little red brick church, which for twenty-one years has sheltered the congregation, is being replaced by a more imposing structure of dazzling white granite, and if the builders keep their promise, the President will soon be able to attend Christmas service in the new church building.

Our photograph shows the new structure as it will appear when finished. For years, the old church has been too small to accommodate the growing congregation, and a larger edifice has been in contemplation. When the President began to attend the church, an impetus was given to the project, and so generous were the contributions from the members of the parish, and from other churches of the same creed, that the cornerstone of the new church was laid on July 1, and the President spread the first layer of plaster. The ceremonies, which were impressively simple, included the singing of "How Firm a Foundation," the President's favorite hymn.

The design is of the late Gothic, and the architect is Mr. Paul Felz. There are to be memorial windows of cathedral glass. One of these is to be contributed by the Young People's Society of the church, to commemorate their fellow members who have passed away. The pastor, Rev. John M. Schick, was assigned to his present mission three years ago. He is a man of fine physique, gray-eyed, a pleasing speaker, and unaffected in manner.

President Roosevelt has always walked to church, except on one occasion, and that was the first Sunday after the injury to his leg. He is generally accompanied by one or two of his children, and sometimes Mrs. Roosevelt goes with him, though she is a member of the Episcopal Church and usually attends there.

Totten's Treasure

A CHRISTMAS STORY by MARY LOWE DICKINSON

WELL, if a body's got to save and skrimp, I dun know but one place is as good as another to stay in; though, for my part, I don't believe the old place yer uncle has willed yer is wuth one cent," and Lydia Perkins drew her face up into a snarl of wrinkles and knocked her spectacles up to the top of her head. The glasses, tied with a string behind her ears, lifted one tuft of her gray corkscrew curls into a shaking plume, that, bobbing up and down, increased her generally warlike aspect. For a minute she looked steadily into her empty teacup, and then, giving it a little roundabout shake, set it down with a click. She was sniffing a battle afar; she wanted to argue, and felt aggrieved that her niece would not give her a chance. But there sat her niece, Bessie, young, pretty and placid, taking her breakfast with that aggravating composure that, as Lydia often told her, "e'en almost set her wild."

"Well, thank the good Lord! old Tim Totten warn't no blood-relation of mine," broke forth at last, as Lydia rattled the cups and saucers into a bright tin pan.

Just why she was thankful might have been difficult to tell; but she was determined to exasperate her niece out of her brown study. And she succeeded; for a pleasant twinkle crept into the thoughtful eyes, and Bessie said:

"But if he had been your mother's brother, auntie, and had never done one thing for her or for you till he died, and left you the owner of his forlorn old house, wouldn't you want to go and see the place?"

"Well, mebbe; but I wouldn't want to stay a month, as you said you would. I'd go and see it, or send somebody that was a better jedge—only young folks nowadays don't never think nobody knows nothing but themselves—and if I found the old place was wuth cleanin' I'd scrub it, or get it scrubbed. I'd know it was clean once; for I don't s'pose it ever was clean, with jest an old, miserly man and no women folks 'round; and then I'd let it or sell it, and if 'twoun'dn't fetch nothin' and warn't fit to live in, I'd jest set it and clear it off the face of the earth."

The twinkle in Bessie's eyes was deepening into a laugh; she was letting Aunt Lydia talk herself out, and when she had said her say, Bessie would do as she thought best, and Lydia would help her. Nothing would afflict her like having Bessie give up. But she wanted to discuss and oppose and protest, and finally to feel herself a little bit of a martyr to yield. This had always been Aunt Lydia's "way" since her dying brother left the motherless Bessie to her care. She had educated the girl from her savings as a country dressmaker, till Bessie was old enough and fortunate enough to secure a position in a public school in Boston. Aunt Lydia knew this was of all things the best way of filling their empty purse; but she fretted and fussed as if it were the straight road to the poor-house or the prison. Still, as the years crept by and the support of the two came altogether upon Bessie, it was Aunt Lydia who worked unceasingly to make their little money go a long way, and Bessie had come to heed her talk as she heeded the summer wind.

"Poor auntie!" she said often to herself. "A whole orphan asylum would not have been too much for her superfluous management, and she would die with only me in her little world if I could not let her talk off the steam. When it comes to action, there's nobody like Aunt Lydia!"

And so it proved in this case; though when Bessie urged taking her Christmas vacation at the old Totten house, and proposed employing a substitute who would occupy their city lodgings and thus lengthen the holiday, of course there was nothing to be said against it that Aunt Lydia did not say; but, all the same, there was nothing to do about it that Aunt Lydia did not do, and the more she scolded, the surer Bessie felt of her help.

"There's one thing I ought to be settled before we start," she said, as she sat in her stocking feet toasting her toes before getting into bed on the night before their journey, "and that is, that there ain't goin' to be no visitin' goin' on up there. I've took all my old gowns, for I jest expect to be on my hands and knees from mornin' till night, goin' from garret to cellar, scrubbin' that house; for one thing is settled, there shan't be no dirt where I be!"

Besides, you'll be in mournin'. I've ripped up my old bombazine, and by the first Sunday that'll be ready for you to wear to meetin'. Folks is always stuck up in these country towns, but I'll show 'em Lydia Perkins knows what's what."

"Don't you think it would make uncle glad," said Bessie, slyly, "to have the old house bright and young folks enjoying it? I wouldn't wonder if that was just what the poor old fellow wanted to make him rest easy in his grave. You know they say that somebody groans awfully in the night, and that a figure has been seen walking about the house, and there have been lights in the windows."

"I'VE GOT HIM, GHOST OR NO GHOST"

"But surely, auntie, you must let Fred come for a day or two. I want to let him see the old place."

"See the old place! Fred Norton better save his money, if he ever expects to get married. Them young doctors gits a shingle out, and then, afore they've had the fust chance to kill anybody with all their stuff, they go a-courtin' jest as if they could support a family. He can't come, not where I be; and, besides, 'tain't proper to set up to have company before your uncle's been dead a month.

"Well, I don't believe a word on't, though 'twas the minister that buried him that wrote it. Naterally people would get up such stories to make you sell the property cheap, and I would sell it or burn it down. Things 'tain't no use better be wiped out and done with. But, remember, you must do as you'd ruther 'bout goin', but there ain't goin' to be no men folks 'round where I be!"

"All right, auntie," said Bess; "I only thought Uncle Tim might be sorry now that he never let us go there, even to the funeral, and that if he is uneasy now—"

"Nonsense, child," interrupted Lydia. "You ain't no call to invite nobody to ease yer uncle's mind. Jest as he's made his bed he's got to lie in it. If he fidgets round and can't stay still, and the good Lord lets him loose, it's none of our business. One thing he'll find out, that ghost or no ghost, dead or alive, Lydia Perkins won't have no men folks 'round. I'm goin' to be up to my knees in suds, and clean that place inch by inch," and, happy in this resolve, Aunt Lydia went to bed.

It was an old two-story farm-house, standing on the outskirts of a small New Hampshire town. It had been white, but was now gray with neglect. It needed some scrubbing, but the neighbors among whom old Tim Totten had lived and died had tidied it up a bit for the funeral, and no one had disordered it since. Some of these neighbors recognized the remnants of furniture as having been there in old Grandma Totten's day. The rag carpets and braided mats in all the rooms, save those occupied by the morose and miserly man, seemed good for another generation. The feather beds were light, the old furniture the best of the day when Tim Totten's mother was a bride.

Aunt Lydia brushed and dusted and scrubbed, and fought the rats and mice and moths, and fumed and fretted, and took solid comfort in it all. The house was solid and strong: she no longer desired to see it burn. The old country instinct awoke, and she wished it was summer and she could dig in the garden, set up the tumble-down bee-hives, mend the broken hen-coops and see the place alive.

"There's no earthly reason," she said, "why it shouldn't bring a payin' price. If rich city folks had it to fix up it would be a place of the handsomest kind. Or if Bessie could make up her mind to a country school, why they could save the city rent, and I calcerlate I could airn suthin' myself with butter and honey and eggs. Then, again, if Bessie will get married, why wouldn't this be the very spot for a fust-class country doctor?"

True, the whole place was at "sixes and sevens," and needed years of work, but Lydia Perkins wasn't afraid of work, and felt ready to tackle it, inch by inch. In this new mood, already their city quarters seemed stuffy and musty, and she dreaded to go back. And, strange to say, much the same sort of fascination hung about the house for its young mistress.

She had often heard her mother talk of this, her grandmother's home, and now she sat before the huge fire which Aunt Lydia kept blazing, and dreamed her own dreams of what might be done with her new possessions, while she counted the days till Fred would come. For of course she knew Fred would come, though Aunt Lydia had shown no sign of relenting.

She was sitting thus on the first Sunday night after their arrival, half asleep from the new sense of leisure and comfort that had beguiled her from the book. She had been to church at the "First Orthodox" with her aunt, and had worn the black bombazine somewhat against her will. From the adjoining room came now and then a gentle snore. Moving her chair back softly, so as not to disturb her aunt, Bessie rose, when suddenly, a sound—half growl, half groan—seemed to come from beneath her very feet. One bound and she was by her aunt's bedside. The night-capped head was erect, and the right hand grasped an uplifted umbrella, which came near descending on Bessie's head.

"What is it, auntie? What is it?"

"Plagued if I know," whispered Aunt Lydia, "but I'll soon find out."

"O! don't move; don't go, auntie. I'm afraid!"

"You jest behave, child, and hand me that red flannel petticoat, quick. If old Tim Totten's 'round here, I'll teach him better manners than to scare his own sister's child."

"O, auntie; don't! don't! What shall I do? I don't want to go down stairs; and I don't want to be left alone!"

"Now, you jest shet up, Bessie. I ain't goin' to do nothin' riskish, for I hain't got no firearms but this old umberell. I put that by the bed every night since I come, and I made up my mind I ain't goin' to be scared by no sech thing as noise. Let me see anything and I'll jest whack it till it's black and blue,"—but hardly were the words uttered when a sound as of banging doors below, and heavy feet as if stamping the snow from boots, and again, the angry sound, half growl, half groan. Aunt Lydia shrank back.

"Well, that's men folks," she said, "and I never said nothin' about regular flesh and blood men. I'll allow I am afraid of them, but ghosts! don't let no ghosts come within reach of my umberell!" But she grasped it rather feebly, and pulled Bessie along with her to the door.

"O, don't go down!" gasped Bessie, white with terror.

"No, I guess I won't, not jest yet anyway. Them boots was stampin' on the cellar stairs."

"But the moving chairs and tables were in the kitchen."

"Yes. Listen; there it is again."

Once more a groan more distant, and then a voice, hollow and yet harsh, rising as from the ground. White with fear, they held their breath.

"Go away out of my house!" it said; and then, "Go away, go away!"

Dumb with terror, the women, still clinging to each other, staggered back to the bed, which shook with their fright. Then all was still for a moment, when outside a loud bang, as of a heavy closing lid, and a sound of a spade digging cautiously the frozen earth. For some time the work went on. At last they ventured to steal to the window and look out, grasping each other tightly by the hand. The night was dark and still; there was no sound save the slow grating of the spade and the rattle of falling earth. Finally this ceased, and the two poor, shivering creatures crept back to bed—not to sleep, but to wait for the morning. Once only Aunt Lydia whispered.

"I calculate that bang was the old feller's coffin lid, and that shovelin' was a-cov'rin' himself up again in his grave. Well, Bessie, I told you before we came, that country life didn't agree with me—but," and she gave a little gasp, "the house has had one scrubbin', anyway."

"Shall we go in the morning, auntie?"

"Yes, indeed; as fast as we can budge."

"Shall we set fire to the house?"

"Not till I get out some of the best of these feather beds, Bessie; why, live geese feathers is wuth dollar and nincence a pound."

"But I'm afraid—I'm afraid he'd come after them," said poor trembling Bess from her place under the blanket, where they were trying to smother their fears.

"Shall we go, Aunt Lydia?" said Bessie at breakfast; "shall we go to-day?"

"No, indeed, not I; who's afraid. There ain't hide nor hair of that ghost to be found this mornin', two kitchen chairs bottom up, and the table upshot, and that's all. Lemme see, wasn't Fred a-comin' to-day?"

"You said you wouldn't have him, Auntie," said Bessie, pitifully.

"Of course I did, and I don't think it's proper to have company, and I don't believe in men folks anyway. They make trouble enough alive, and we ain't well rid of 'em even after they are dead and gone. Now this house is yourn, left regular by will, but I've no doubt that stingy old Tim Totten is so mad to think that he had to give it up that he can't bear to see you take the comfort of it."

"Don't talk so, Aunt Lydia," said Bessie, whose fears had outlived the night.

"Yes, I will! I'll speak my mind by daylight anyway. He shall know my judgment of his ackshins, and 'fore night comes I'll have Fred Norton here. If I've got to hev men folks meddlin' round, I'll hev 'em in flesh and blood. I'm just goin' straight to the village to telegraph."

"Perhaps it wouldn't be necessary, auntie," said Bessie, hesitating.

"Yes, I will, quick's ever I've done the dishes. If you're afraid, you can take hold and wipe and come along."

"Yes, auntie, but—well, he'll come anyway. I let him know yesterday when I went to the Post Office, that—that you would expect him to-day."

"O you did, did you? So that is the way you are guided by me."

Nevertheless, with great alacrity Aunt Lydia made her preparations for Fred. The train on which he was to arrive was due at eight o'clock. Supper was all ready and the old sitting-room looked cheery in the blaze of the bright wood fire. Bessie had decided that they would not tell Fred anything dreadful until after the evening meal was passed. She did not want to spoil his visit at once.

Eight o'clock came. They heard the whistle of the train. The omnibus would bring him in ten minutes to the house. Ten minutes passed and no Fred; ten more, a half an hour, then two anxious women with shawls on their heads who had been watching the long, frozen road to the village, went shivering back to the house. There was no other train from Boston that night. Doubtless he would come in the morning, but meantime, there was that terrible night. "We can walk to the village and stay at the hotel," suggested Bessie, timidly.

"Yes, and have it all over town before breakfast, that we dassent stay; that Tim Totten's ghost scared us out of house and home," said Lydia, with a scornful sniff.

"We could stay at the minister's, then."

"No, we couldn't. He'd preach about uneasy souls very next Sunday, and I didn't take all the trouble to make over that black bumbazine to sit and hear the sins of my relations, when they wasn't blood-relations, either. I couldn't put up with that—but," seeing that Bessie was really afraid, she added, pausing, with teapot in hand on her way to the kitchen, "tell you what, Bessie, we'll walk up to Widder Joneses and get her son Bill to jest come over here and sleep."

"Isn't this Bill Jones the man that used to work for Uncle Tim?" asked Bessie, as they went trudging down the lonely road.

"Yes, I believe he kind o' chored round at the last when yer uncle wasn't able to do for himself, cut wood and sech. Guess he's a kind of shiftless feller that don't 'mount to much for work."

"Well, I don't care for his work if the fellow has courage," said Bessie, whose hope of protection was doomed to disappointment, for when they reached his mother's cottage Bill Jones was not at home.

With spirits dampened, the two women turned their faces homeward. As they neared the house, suddenly Bessie grasped Lydia's arm.

"Look, auntie! See! What is that?" she whispered.

"Where, Bessie, where? Why, goodness gracious me. I can't see the fust thing."

"There, behind the house, by the woodpile, all in white."

Lydia gazed, and sure enough a tall figure clad in white rose slowly by the orchard wall and glided swiftly to the house, disappearing by the pile of wood.

"Bless my stars! It's Tim Totten, I do believe!" gasped Lydia, "for the graveyard's over that way. Shall we run?"

"No, no, auntie; where could we run? Let's stay here beside the wall. I'd rather be here than inside."

Half ashamed of her proposal to run, Lydia took courage, and said, "I meant should we run after it, of course I did. It's a pretty good sized ghost to go in a key-hole, and I've got the keys in my pocket here."

"It has gone in, though. See there! There's a light in the cellar," and suddenly a yellow gleam shot through the slats nailed across the cellar windows.

"I wonder why my uncle nailed up all those windows," whispered Bessie.

"And the door, too, at the top of the steps leading from the cellar to the yard. He had the wood-pile put against that so that any one must go to the cellar by the kitchen stairs."

"Hark! what is that?"

"The chairs and tables are at it in the kitchen again," and Lydia flourished her umbrella.

"I can't stand it!" she whispered, summoning all her courage. "I've a good mind jest to creep up and peep into the kitchen winder. If it's anything awful we can cut and run."

Very cautiously they crept toward the house, holding their breath and pausing at every step. From the kitchen came a chorus of banging doors and dancing chairs and groans, and then all was still. Once more, as they crept behind the well-curb and crouched near the ground, the threatening voice reached them that had bidden them get out of the house the night before.

They could not catch the words, but the last vestige of their courage departed at the sound. Too frightened to go or stay, they just grasped each other's hand and crouched together in the darkness. From the well-curb they could see the road, and also the rear of the house, elongated by the large pile of uncut wood. Listening to the strange noises in the kitchen and watching the lurid light that gleamed through the windows of the cellar, they yet caught a glimpse of a man who, approaching slowly, as if uncertain of his way, entered the open gate and passed up the walk to the front door.

A moment after the sound of the old knocker resounded through the house.

"There's Bill Jones after all," gasped Bessie, who scrambled to her feet and sped around the corner as fast as her fright would permit.

At the knock, all noise ceased in the kitchen, and all was dark in the cellar. One final bang, like the closing of a heavy chest, made Lydia shudder as she struggled to her feet.

The dark night, the icy ground, the cramping of the limbs stiffened by her crouching attitudes, her trembling fright, all made her rising a matter of difficulty, but once up, umbrella in hand, and starting for Bessie and Bill Jones, she glanced backward, and then with a sudden infusion of courage and strength, born of her assurance that help was at hand, suddenly flew at the woodpile, and, throwing herself on her knees, began to belabor something or somebody with her long waiting umbrella, while vigorous epithets accompanied each stinging blow. Round the corner came Bessie, and after her a man, to find Lydia belaboring a head and shoulders and one protesting arm that protruded apparently from a hole in the ground.

"I've got him, and ghost or no ghost, I'm givin' him what he desaves, and if he's Tim Totten, 'fore I've done with him he'll wished he had stayed in his grave. There! take that and that! I told you I'd make him black and blue," and in her excitement she might have broken the poor wretch's head had not Bessie's companion bent over her and tried to take the umbrella away.

"And who be you, meddlin' round, I'd like to know?" said she, casting a wrathful glance over her shoulder.

"Why auntie, it's Fred. Don't you see it's Fred?"

"Oh, it's you, is it? Well, there's flesh and blood in that there ghost, that is, if I've left any bones. Lucky you're a doctor, for mebbe you can mend him," and she moved, panting, out of the way, while Fred bent over the struggling man. He was still smarting and writhing from the well laid-on umbrella, but with Fred's help was soon dragged from the hole under the woodpile from which he was escaping when Lydia saw and fell upon him in her wrath. Half-dragged, half-walking into the kitchen, where again lay the chairs and tables overturned, they let the light full on his face, and Lydia started back.

"Goodness gracious me! if I haven't been and smashed up Billy Jones," and without another word she dropped her umbrella and drew a small rocking-chair before him and began to question the sullen and angry man.

"Now then, you be Bill Jones. Yes, you be. I know you. You've been here since we came, for a job, and you worked for old Tim Totten. Now what, in the name of common sense, ever set you cuttin' up capers like this? Now 'tain't no use bein' sulky, for when you are shut up in a dungeon cell with han'cuffs for vittles, and bread and water round your wrists, it'll make you open your mouth, and you might as well speak out first as last. Didn't you never go to Sunday School? Hain't you been fetched up right here in the midst of savin' grace and sparin' marcies? Was dyin' the only way you could find to get a livin'? Hain't nobody taught you t'was wrong to steal from two helpless orphans that had n't no men folks to take care on 'em? Take care now," and she reached for her umbrella as the fellow glared at her, and made an angry sign.

"I'm not a thief," answered the captive angrily.

"Then you have stolen nothing from the house?" asked Fred quietly.

"Not a thing. I never stole a thing in my life, and if you'll let me off I'll tell you all about it. The fact is, I worked here for old Tim Totten. He hired me to pile up that wood, and he told me to pile it over that outside cellar door. He had nailed up all the windows before, and everybody said he was rich and had money somewhere about the house. When I saw all the ways into the cellar closed, I thought he must be hiding his money there, and I watched and saw him one night come down with a candle and a large envelope, which he took from his inside pocket. Just then my foot slipped, and I made a noise as I was looking through the crack in the window and he heard it, and quick as a flash he put out the light and I heard his step coming up the stair. I ran home, but it stuck in my head more and more that he hid money in the cellar. So when I piled the wood I made a hollow place over the cellar trap-steps and left a hole so that I could take away a few outside sticks and creep in to the trap-door. Then suddenly the old man died, and I heard the old house and all 'twas in it was willed away, and I knew they didn't find any money in it, and I believed I could, if I could only get a chance to work. I meant to dig the cellar all over, foot by foot, and take out every stone in the wall, and I had begun before these women came, and of course the light and the noise made a ghost story and kept people away. I only wanted to drive these folks away till I had had a decent chance to look. I came up in the kitchen because I knew this woman here," casting a spiteful glance at Lydia, "slept over the kitchen, and that a voice calling in this room would be heard up the chimney."

"What was the noise like the falling of a coffin lid?" asked Bessie.

"The trap-door. I lifted it and let it fall, and the shovel was used in the cellar, and when I heard once at the store that Old Totten was heard to shut his coffin lid and throw the dirt out of his own grave, I thought that sound would surely keep folks off."

"And you have found nothing?" asked Fred. The fellow hung his head. Fred lighted a lantern, and opening the cellar door motioned to Bill to go before him down the stairs. Fred was not long away. He returned without his captive, but in his hand was a large paper parcel.

"This was found in the cellar," he said, "in a hole in the wall from which only to-night the man had succeeded in starting the stones. Together we got it out while we were there. It is a part of your inheritance, Bessie, and you should open it yourself."

But before she could take it, Aunt Lydia reached out her hand, which, leaving Bessie's free, she put it in that of Frederic Norton, and stood gazing down upon Aunt Lydia's apron, which seemed suddenly to be filled with green papers—United States coupon bonds.

"Oh, my, my, my! I declare I'm afraid to touch 'em. I feel's if Old Tim Totten's ghost was standing right there behind my chair, goin' to snatch 'em away," and she looked behind her with a frightened air, just in time to see Fred bending to put a kiss on Bessie's shining hair.

Under this shock she rallied, and gathering up the package began to count, and just as she said one, two, three, four, five, six, on to twelve—the bell rung out on the frosty air, and at each stroke Lydia Perkins' voice chimed in, "ten, eleven, twelve," and there is twelve two-thousand-dollar United States bonds, and I wish you a Happy Christmas."

SILVER LEAVES AND CHRISTMAS CAROLS

NOW, when all America is rejoicing over the approach of the Christmas festival, the experiences of Miss S. D. Doremus, an American woman journeying in the Orient around holiday times, will be of seasonable interest. From the date of her departure to the East—whither she was sent by the Woman's Union Missionary Society (the pioneer of America's women's foreign missionary societies), on a tour of inspection of their work in India, China and Japan, to that of her return to New York, Miss Doremus traveled about 40,000 miles, and saw many strange peoples as they live in their own homes. At a reception which the society recently gave her, she told of her travels. The following narrative embraces selections from her informal talk then, and from later conversation.

On arrival at Bombay, I was ushered almost immediately into a beautiful Christian school, where little dark-eyed children were practicing Christmas carols. Mrs. Edward S. Hume had met me at the dock, and carried me at once to the Hume Orphanage, an institution not unknown to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, who support orphans there. Noting how demure the Hindus were, I asked, "Do these girls never laugh?" "Wait," said Mrs. Hume, "and I'll show you." That night she took me into the court, where they played games among the palms under the tropical moon. As famine orphans, most of them had come from different villages, bringing different games with them.

I reached Jhansi at the time of the full moon, whose white light flooded the Mission Bungalow. Every palm and plant in the compound stood out in distinct outline. Nearby is a big building, over whose gateway runs this legend: "Woman's Union Missionary Society of America." It was like a touch of home to see that. The building is the Mary S. Ackermann Hoyt Memorial Hospital. Medical work is opening all doors to our missionaries, even those of zenanas difficult of access. Indian princes are sending for our physicians. I visited many zenanas, among them that of the Deputy Collector, on his invitation. Passing through his study, filled with scientific books and other advanced literature, we entered his wife's apartments, lighted only by a door opening into a court. My hostess sat cross-legged on a bed. Her husband, in perfect English, engaged me in animated discussion of things American, in which he evinced great interest. Her face lighted up, she asked wistfully: "O, what are you talking about?" "Babu" (a title of respect), "can't you explain to her?" I said. "She could not possibly understand," he replied, as he would of a child.

Things impressing me most profoundly in India were the density of population; the ignorance of the women; the culture, intelligence, courtliness of the men; the myriads of idol shrines, and the hideousness of the things set up for worship therein. "Babu," I asked of many a learned and distinguished Hindu, "can you tell me how it is that your beauty-loving people can worship such monstrosities?" "It was in the infancy of our race that these statues were made," they answered simply. Then I would respond quickly:

"But, Babu, you Aryans are our kin, and should worship the one God with us." Our Bible-women, American and native, use bright-colored pictures and texts in their work. The people so love gay hues. In their pilgrimages to the Ganges at the festival of the new moon, even the hens are painted blue and pink, and cattle straying hither and yon are stained, hoof and horn, in vivid shades. A strange thing is this worship of the river goddess, Gunga, to whom the multitude goes laden with countless offerings of grains and fruits and flowers. High-caste women are in the procession, the government, by posts and wires and police guarding one side of the road for them. The brilliant, richly-bordered sarees of ladies of wealth and rank, the spotless white of widows' weeds, and the rags of the beggars make striking contrasts. I went from Cawnpore with our Bible-women, who take advantage of this festival to present the Gospel in song and printed page to the river worshipers, and many a convert to Christ is thus won. We have at Cawnpore the most beautiful orphanage I saw anywhere in India; here again I met THE CHRISTIAN HERALD famine children among the 300 girls who greeted me on the lawn, carrying bright red banners, inscribed "We welcome you." I had the pleasure of teaching them some of our beautiful hymns for their Christmas celebration.

Our largest zenana work is at Allahabad. In one zenana I met a grandmother of thirty, with a large family. Two of her sons, magnificent-looking men, engaged me in conversation. In response to my questions concerning a little girl who sat apart in the garb of humiliation, one said: "It is our widowed sister. Because of her widowhood she must go with shaven head and wear that dress." "How long was she married?" I asked. "Twenty days." "Did she love her husband much?" "She hardly knew him." "O Babu," I cried, "how can you suffer this thing? Why should she wear these garments of degradation? She is so young and she is beautiful. It is too sad." "It is our social law," he said, not without sorrow. "None of our caste would speak to us if we did not treat her like a widow."

Yet light is breaking in India. During Christmas week, 1901, at the Seventeenth Indian National Congress, at Calcutta, the opening ode was written by a young daughter of one of the most noted families of the Brahma Somaj. She was present, and led the native orchestra. Strange chorus it was, pealing forth in thousands of voices, Hindus singing "Glory be to Ram!" Mohammedans, "Glory be to Allah!" Christians, "Glory be to Jah!"

Tears came into my eyes at this strange Christian anthem. Better I liked something I had heard at our orphanage. Early Christmas morning, a sweet carol about Jesus outside my door awaked me. I opened it, to behold our little Hindu orphans drawn up outside, one with a silver leaf to present me. Silver leaves from Cashmere are prized offerings. I never heard children answer Bible questions with such rapidity and correctness as our Bengali girls at Calcutta. I saw 1,200 girls assembled at the Senate House for examination by government inspectors. Their readiness and proficiency was astonishing. How pretty they looked—like a living flower-garden! On the foreheads of many of them was a little red mark, a sign of marriage. Children of ten carry this badge between their brows, for though missionaries have succeeded in raising the marriageable age to twelve, the law is evaded.

I was loth to leave India, but China drew me on. In our hospital at Shanghai, the "Margaret Williamson," 35,000 patients are treated yearly. A sight I never tired of was morning prayers; all convalescents attended; many invalids quietly looked on from their pillows; and little almond-eyed children, arranged in a row of tiny chairs, joined in the singing. I entered many Chinese homes. Here, as in India, unbounded hospitality met me. I will never forget the gentle, almond-eyed women who clustered around me, listening to the Bible-women singing hymns, and calling me the "Honorable Lady," and the "Lady Archbishop." In Japan, I was struck with courtesy even passing that of China. Why, as we passed along the streets, even the tiniest children would be dropping to their knees, on their mats, kow-towing. At school, they moved like shadows, they were so quiet and orderly. The older girls in the Union School at Yokohama are carrying on much religious work; they have organized a W. C. T. U., and a Christian Endeavor, and a Sunday School. They go out and draw the street Arabs in—many of these are boys with babies on their backs. When the babies make any noise the boys walk up and down to quiet them. Boys are the "little mothers" in Japan.

The generosity of Oriental women touched me. Wherever I visited, gifts, as well as refreshments, were pressed upon me. In Hindu homes too poor to tender more, a handful of Cardamom seed was offered. They ask the Gospel of us. Shall we not give it them?

A Slander Refuted

SOMETIME ago, United States Senator Burton, of Kansas, who had recently returned from a visit to Hawaii, was quoted in the public prints as having asserted that the Christian missionaries in Hawaii had swindled the untutored natives by taking their lands from them, in exchange for "certificates entitling the holders to admission to heaven." The Senator had gone to Hawaii as a member of a Sub-Committee, appointed by Congress to investigate and report upon the condition of the people in these distant islands, which have now come under American rule.

While believing such a charge to be absolutely unfounded, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, rather than oppose it with an unauthoritative denial at the moment, decided to first secure the statements of the accused missionaries and let them speak for themselves. We immediately communicated with the American missionaries now in Hawaii, and the result is shown in the letters printed below, from the oldest, most experienced and best-known missionaries on the islands:

HONOLULU, NOV. 10, 1902.

To the Editor of the Christian Herald, New York City.

Dear Sir: Yours of October 16 is duly to hand.

I did not have the pleasure of meeting Senator Burton while he was in these islands. As to the remarks imputed to him regarding the missionaries in Hawaii, perhaps the newspaper reporter has not accurately reported what he said. As an editor, you may have fallen in with an unreliable reporter. So we will not seriously judge the Senator until the report is confirmed.

But, supposing the Hon. Senator had told us here in Hawaii, that the clergy of New England were sharpers, and had cheated the poor Irishman out of his eye-teeth, we would have laughed and forgotten the speech the next day. Such speeches by children of the old missionaries have heard from infancy, and they roll off from us like water from a duck's back.

The last missionary that the American Board sent to this country was Rev. J. Leadingham, who has been and is to-day as landless as was Father Jacob when he took the stones of Luz or Bethel for a pillow, and lay down under the stars to sleep; but he and his little tribe are comfortably housed in our hospitable city. The last preceding missionary of the American Board was Rev. C. M. Hyde, D.D., of Mass., who died three years since, unpossessed of even a homestead in the city and on the islands to which he gave the most fruitful years of an honored and useful life. The only survivor of the earlier generation of missionary fathers, Mr. Edward Bailey, lives with his son in California, and, so far as I know, has no possessions in these islands.

To the influence exerted upon the chiefs and leaders of the people by the missionaries who landed in these islands during the three decades from 1820 to 1850, is due the fact that the native Hawaiians of to-day possess any land. The laboring people or farmers of the early decades of the nineteenth century possessed not a foot of land. They were tenants at will, liable to be dispossessed at any moment by the king, who held the soil, or by the chiefs, who held the lands under the king.

Under the advice of the missionaries, and by the aid of Judge Wm. Lee and others, King Kamehameha III. established, in December, 1845, a Land Commission, under whose administration the king gave a "fee simple" title to every native Hawaiian who would pay for the survey of the lands occupied and cultivated by him. In this manner, by the bounty of the patriot king, thousands of the people became possessed of portions of land, and the missionaries uniformly advised the people not to part with their lands at any price.

I am of the opinion that the American public has taken the United States Senator too seriously, more seriously than he takes himself.

HONOLULU, H. T., Oct. 31, 1902.

Editor The Christian Herald:—Yours of October 16th is at hand. In reply, I would say that it seems incredible that Senator Burton should make such a statement. If he did, it is a matter of regret that his visit here should have been to so little purpose that he could not see for himself how utterly preposterous such a charge would be. I have no doubt that plenty of such stories might have been poured into his ears by the calumniators of missions and missionaries, who abound here, but their very absurdity should have put him on his guard. It is perfectly safe to say that no such transaction, as is described in the dispatch, ever took place here in the case of a Protestant missionary, and I have never heard of one in the case of a Catholic or Mormon.

I notice that he is quoted as saying that the missionaries were from Boston, and have been here recently. This would naturally refer to missionaries of the American Board. I would say that the only missionaries that the American Board has appointed to these islands in the last twenty-five years, are my wife and myself, appointed eight years ago, and neither of us owns a foot of land here; nor has either of us ever owned any.

Very truly yours,
J. LEADINGHAM.

HONOLULU, H. T., October 24.

Editor of The Christian Herald:—Your favor of October 16 is received. In reply, let me say that Senator Burton's extraordinary statement, so far as it would refer to the missionaries of the Hawaiian Evangelical Association, is entirely without foundation. There is very little real estate owned by any of us, and whatever land (house lots) we do hold, was not bought of natives.

Though I cannot speak with the same authority for other missionaries, I have no reason to believe that my brethren of the Roman Catholic or Episcopal churches, in whatever land dealings they may possibly have had with natives, have not treated them in any way other than fairly.

Indeed it is a question if in view of the facts, the honorable Senator spoke seriously, if he were not trying in this statement to make political capital by burlesquing the so-called "missionary party" now in power. He alone of the three commissioners who recently visited the islands seemed out of sympathy with the government, and inclined to look with favor on the so-called "home rule party," which supports Wilcox.

Very truly yours,
O. P. EMERSON.

There is in these letters a generous unanimity of opinion, on the part of the writers, that the Senator has either been misquoted, or that he has been grossly imposed upon by those whom ex-United States Consul Gilman has aptly called "the disgruntled element" in Hawaiian politics, who are notoriously and unscrupulously inimical to the missionary cause. We cannot for a moment believe that the Kansas Senator himself invented so monstrous an absurdity, or that it was the outcome of any part of his legitimate investigation. But an injustice has been done, which ought to be repaired. Senator Burton owes it to the missionaries, who have been the sufferers by this silly slander; to the American people, who have been misinformed by his dissemination of the story, and lastly he owes it to the dignity of the United States Senate, to make such prompt explanation as any honorable public official would do under like circumstances.

New York's Church Census

THE figures of the church census of New York, conducted by the "Church News Association," suggest interesting considerations. The area covered was the Borough of Manhattan—that is, the area formerly known as New York, before the inclusion of Brooklyn and the Bronx. It has a population of 1,931,162, of whom 1,448,189 are over fifteen years of age. It contains three hundred and sixty-six churches, of which two hundred and eighty-five are Protestant, and eighty-one Roman Catholic. On the first three Sundays of November, the adults attending each church were counted, at both morning and evening services, and the numbers averaged for the three Sundays. It was found that the total, adding together those at the morning and evening services, was 451,631. That would imply at first sight that 996,558 persons, or about two-thirds of the population, did not go to church. There are, however, two facts to be taken into account, which modify the inferences to be drawn from the figures. One is, that as the count was made on Sunday, no notice was taken of the Jewish attendance at the Synagogues on Saturday. It would, therefore, be fair to deduct the number of Jews in the city from the total population, before estimating the total proportion of the citizens who went to church to those who were not there. On the other hand, there must be a large number of persons who attended both morning and evening services, and each of those would be counted as two. It is a curious coincidence that a similar count was made across the Atlantic on one of the same Sundays. The attendants at the churches of Liverpool were counted on November 2, and the result was a slightly smaller proportion. There were 178,777 persons in church in a population of 685,276—that is twenty-six per cent., or less than one in three.

The analysis of the figures for New York is as suggestive as the totals. The aggregate membership of all the churches is 696,153. As only 451,631 were present, it is obvious that only sixty-five per cent. attended, and about one member in every three was an absentee. A remarkable fact was that the proportion of absentees was larger in the Roman Catholic than the Protestant churches. The former claims a membership of 522,130, while only 317,454, or about sixty-one per cent., were present. The Protestant churches, with a membership of 174,023, had an attendance of 134,177, or seventy-seven per cent. The difference may be due in part to the fact that a Roman Catholic seldom attends church more than once a day.

Among the Protestant churches, the denomination showing the largest attendance was the Protestant Episcopal, with 33,137; next the Baptist, 27,225; third the Methodist Episcopal, 20,191; fourth the Presbyterian, 18,920; fifth the Reformed Dutch, 10,241; sixth the Lutheran, 7,542; seventh Congregational,

2,153; and eighth Disciples of Christ, 848. A curious fact is shown by the analysis according to sex. In the Roman Catholic churches only about one-fifth of those attending were men, while in the Episcopal churches one-third were men, and in the Congregational churches more than one-half.

Sad as it is to know that so large a proportion of the citizens of New York as these figures indicate, did not go to church, it is matter for congratulation that the showing was not worse. New York has been so persistently represented as a Godless city, that we are glad to learn that nearly half a million of its citizens were found in church on the Lord's Day. The fact encourages the hope that if New York deserves to be called the modern Sodom, as its detractors allege, it at least would not perish, as did its ancient prototype, for lack of ten righteous men within its borders.

The Gladdest of Festivals

CHRISTMAS is the greatest festival of the year. People talk of holiday-making; but this one season radiates gladness. There is around it, as it were, a halo, or atmosphere, of joy. From the time when we were tiny children, before we knew the meaning of work, when every day was a play-day, we looked forward to Christmas as a magic occasion.

And now we are grown up, we still look forward to Christmas. There is the excitement of the mutual exchange of gifts, the exhilaration of the winter festivities, the pleasure of family re-unions, the inspiring sense of holiday.

Holiday means properly holy day. Be as generous, as light-hearted, as happy as you may this Christmas time—enjoy your holiday with all the energy that high spirits can impart, but do not forget it is a holy day.

There is a real danger of doing this—of losing sight of the cause of the festival in the festivities. In England the village boys look forward to Good Friday, because on that day they begin to play marbles. In France, the whole population looks forward to Lent, because it is preceded by the season of carnival—the masked balls, the gay processions, the confetti fights, and the battle of flowers, and we doubt if there is ever a prettier spectacle than these gay contests between happy people, whose weapons are bunches of violets, bouquets of sweet-scented carnations, red roses, white roses, yellow roses, the perfumed mimosa, lilies, and all the flowers that grow on the foothills that slope down to the deep blue waters of the Mediterranean.

Why do you look forward to Christmas? When you celebrate the birthday of one of your own family or friends, your first thought is of him, your one wish to please him on this day above all others. Have the same thought on Christmas day—only more solemnly; have the same wish, only more fervently. As you wake on Christmas morning, ask yourself this one question, What would the happy exchange of gifts, the fun of the festivities, the joy of that family circle clasped hand in hand, the merriment of the holiday, with its snow, its holly, its mistletoe, its plum pudding, its turkey, its Christmas tree, and all its good wishes, mean if that event had not taken place which the day is set apart to celebrate?

Keep that thought in your mind during the day—let it be your last thought at night.

"The Scarlet Thread of Prophecy"

The Red Letter Bible sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages.

If you want a Red Letter Bible send your order at once. The edition is Thirty Thousand, or one Bible for every ten subscribers. We cannot produce another edition before April 1. The work is very difficult. It requires greater care than it would be likely to receive at an outside establishment. Hence, the printing is done at our own extensive plant. And even with these extraordinary facilities, it takes nearly six months to produce an edition. There are Sixteen Hundred Pages, many in Two Colors, and it is the accurate two-color work which takes the time. Subscribe to-day, and thus make sure of a copy.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Turkish Embarrassment

MEMBERS of discontent, periodically fanned into flame, typify the normal condition of that region lying north and west of Turkey proper, which we know by the general name of Macedonia. This year, both regions are in revolt, and the armed bands, supported by the Macedonian Committee, which cannot be dignified by the name of an army, are better organized than usual. The Turkish troops, numbering forty thousand, whom the Sultan sent to suppress the revolt, were met with fierce determination, and though the Macedonians were too prudent to meet them in the open field, they so harassed the Turks, that reinforcements were hurriedly collected, and sent to the scene of conflict. It is now reported that the Macedonians have been scattered, large numbers taking refuge in Bulgaria, where both government and people are in sympathy with them. The Sultan, indeed, contends that the disturbances are fomented by Bulgaria, and declares that a large proportion of the insurgents killed and prisoners taken, were Bulgarians. The Bulgarian government, however, denies the charge, but has formally drawn the attention of the European Powers to the disturbed condition of the region and to the necessity for reform and better administration. Newspaper correspondents who have been through the region, corroborate the charge of misgovernment, but admit that, unassisted, the Macedonians cannot shake off the Turkish yoke. Nor have they much hope of receiving help from any of the great powers. Their acts of lawlessness, like the seizure of Miss Stone, the American missionary, have alienated public sympathy in Europe and have suggested a doubt of their capacity for self-government. If they only knew it, their brigandage and defiance of law are suicidal to their hopes of deliverance; but allowance must be made for the desperation which comes from suffering under tyranny. The result of oppression noticed by the inspired preacher is still in operation:

Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad (Eccles. 7 : 7).

An Amateur Medical Helper

A New York doctor recently received valuable assistance from one of his patients in a crisis. He received a summons at the hospital to which he is attached, to attend a man who had been seriously injured by cuts on the face and neck. He made a temporary application to the wounds, and then put the patient in the ambulance to take him to the hospital. The ambulance was just starting, when a policeman ran up and informed the doctor that a man in the next street had attempted to commit suicide, and immediate attention was necessary to save his life. The doctor drove round to the house and, finding the man still alive, put him also into the ambulance. The second patient was in a critical condition, and on the way to the hospital the doctor worked over him. He worked his arms to and fro to induce respiration and adopted other measures to keep him alive. The other patient took a deep interest in the case, and, though he was suffering himself, helped the doctor in his efforts. It is said at the hospital that if the man does recover, it will be largely due to the service rendered by his fellow-patient during that ride in the ambulance. Some men in his place might have argued that their own injuries relieved them of the duty of exerting themselves to save life, and besides, that such work was the doctor's business, not theirs. Many a pastor has had to deal with members of churches who argue in that way. He is expected to do all the soul-saving himself, and even those whom he has helped are not willing to help him.

We then as workers together with him, beseech you that ye receive not the grace of God in vain (II. Cor. 6 : 1.)

A Man Without a Country

The Cuban immigration laws are causing no little trouble to various persons and considerable loss to the steamship companies. Last week, an Italian who had secured an engagement as waiter in a hotel in Havana was not allowed to land in that city, because his engagement by the Havana hotel-keeper was a violation of the Cuban Contract Labor law, and he was sent back to New York. On his arrival he was treated as a new immigrant, and, as he had not the amount of money the law requires, he was not permitted to land. The steamship company sees no way of getting rid of him but that of sending him to Italy. Another case is that of a man who went to Cuba as a stowaway. The Cuban authorities rejected him, and when he was brought back to New York he was excluded. The steamship people kept him on board until they reached Vera Cruz, where they tried to lose him, but as he proved to be a Spaniard who had settled in the United States he was rejected there. The man is absolutely without a country; even the land of his birth refusing to admit him. He is in bad case and is becoming melancholy. It may be hoped that some one may meet him who is able to tell him how he may make sure of a welcome into the heavenly city when he quits this life:

When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up (Ps. 27 : 10).

The New Russian Church.

With imposing ceremonies, on November 23, the Bishop of North America consecrated a new Russian Orthodox Church in New York. It has been built in Ninety-seventh, near Fifth Avenue. It is, as will be seen by the accompanying illustration, in the Byzantine style of architecture, with five bell-shaped domes surmounted by gilded crosses, and is a very handsome edifice. The cost is said to have been $150,000, of which one third was a contribution from the Czar. The ceremony of consecration attracted a large and distinguished company, prominent among them being Count Cassini, the Russian Ambassador to the United States, with his suite, clad in their official uniforms. Dr. Grafton, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Fond du Lac, was present as an honored guest. Russians and members of Syrian and Armenian Societies thronged the church, and a party of Cossacks in uniform mounted guard at the doors. The rite included a procession around the outside of the church by the Bishop and the clergy. The crosses and insignia were blessed separately and with impressive solemnity. At the close of the ceremony, which occupied four hours, a prayer was offered for the Czar and President Roosevelt. To Christians accustomed to the simple worship of Protestant churches, the elaborate and ornate ceremonial of the Russian church appears superstitious, but it is evidently sincere, and the Divine Object of worship is the same. To objectors, the Bishop and his people would probably give the answer that Paul made, when he was accused by the Jews.

After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets (Acts 24 : 14).

BRIEF NOTES

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favor on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

Dr. Joseph Parker, of the City Temple, London, whose portrait appeared in this journal last week, died on Nov. 28.

The Buenos Ayres Y. M. C. A., though less than a year old, has 250 members, of many nationalities and representing seventeen denominations, beside men of no religious affiliations.

Rev. Parak Iskanderian, a native Christian pastor at Ismidt, Turkey, sends THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an appeal on behalf of Anoushian Marriam, a Christian woman of Marsovan, who lately lost one of her lower limbs. The pastor asks if any of the good friends in the United States will aid in procuring for the sufferer an artificial leg. Any so disposed can communicate with him direct.

Dr. John Robertson, Minister of the City Temple, Glasgow, is now in this country in response to an urgent invitation from prominent clergymen. He desires to spend his time during his stay as fully as possible in evangelistic work. Letters may be addressed to him in care of Dr. Niles, Copley Square, Boston, Mass.

A Treasure for Many

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have just received the Story of the Hall of Fame, and I gladly inform you that I am at a loss to find fitting words in which to express my pleasure and surprise. Each time I open it, I wonder how such a valuable and interesting book could be published for so small a price. Your excellent paper is worth more than the two dollars paid for both. I shall be pleased to lend both paper and book to my friends, and afterward send them to a Sunday School, that will be made happy by the gift.

THE BIRTH OF THE SAVIOUR

Christmas Lesson

By DR. and MRS.
WILBUR F. CRAFTS

GOLDEN TEXT: "For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." LUKE 2: 11.

THE life of Jesus did not begin at Bethlehem, Jesus said: "I am come down from heaven" (John 6: 38). Long before that first Christmas morning, when Jesus came into this world as a babe, long before the world was made, he lived in heaven with God (Prov. 8: 22). "He was before all things" (Col. 1: 17). God used to say of Jesus in those far-off times, before the earth was created, "I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son;" and "Let all the angels of God worship him." But to the Son he saith, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (Heb. 1: 5-8). The story of Jesus, then, begins in heaven, where he was not a child, but the Son of God, before the world was made. From the time when Adam was created, until the Wondrous Babe came to the manger of Bethlehem, Jesus did not live on the earth, but many people think that he often visited it in an angel form, sometimes with the name of "Jehovah" and sometimes as "the Angel of Jehovah" (Ex. 3: 9). He thus visited Adam (Gen. 3: 8), Enoch (Gen. 5: 24), Abraham (Gen. 18: 1, etc.), Jacob (Gen. 32: 3-4), Moses (Ex. 3: 2, etc.), Joshua (Joshua 5: 13-15), Gideon (Judg. 6: 11), and others, to make them brave for the right. For David (Ps. 2: 7) and Isaiah (Isa. 6) and Ezekiel (Ezek. 10) God pulled back the curtain of heaven for a little while, and let them see Jesus in his glory on his heavenly throne. But God told his prophet-preachers to tell the people that this heavenly being would by-and-by come to the world for a long visit, and live there as a babe, a boy and a man, that he might help both young and old out of sin and sorrow. First, men were told of what race Jesus would be—not the Son of angels, but the Son of a woman (Gen. 3: 15). Then God told the people, by the prophets, from which son of Noah Jesus should descend: "He shall dwell in the tents of Shem" (Gen. 9: 27). Then, little by little, God's prophets foretold that Jesus would be a descendant of Abraham (Gen. 22: 18), of Jacob (Num. 24: 27), of Judah (Gen. 49: 10), of Jesse (Isa. 11: 1), of David (Ps. 132: 11, 12), and that his mother would be a virgin (Isa. 7: 14), and "his name one that the mouth of the Lord should name" (Isa. 62: 2). Then the prophets told the people that Jesus would be born in Bethlehem (Micah 5: 2), at a certain time (Dan. 9: 25-27), with a star over his cradle (Num. 24: 17), which wise men and kings would follow from far-off lands to bring him presents and worship him (Ps. 72: 11-15). The prophets also said that he would be carried into Egypt (Hos. 11: 1), that he would in his manhood heal the blind, the lame and the sick (Isa. 35: 5, 6), and feed the multitudes (Isa. 40: 2), and enter Jerusalem as a King (Zech. 9: 9). Last of all, he was to suffer and die in our stead (Isa. 53), and rise from the grave into heaven (Ps. 68: 18). From heaven he comes again every day, though we cannot see him, to stand at our side and help us to be Christians (Matt. 28: 20). Some day he will come again in his "glorious appearing" to be the acknowledged King of earth and heaven (Tit. 2: 13; Rom. 14: 11). Will you to-day make "room" for him in your heart to be your Saviour and King? (Luke 2: 12; Rev. 3: 20).

The foregoing life of Jesus from the whole Bible might well be repeated by the pastor from memory, or read freely and slowly, as an introduction to the lesson, omitting the references in parentheses, of course, which would be of value, however, for a Bible reading or for a broader survey than Luke alone gives of the significance of Christmas. Indeed, the full meaning of the Golden Text implies a knowledge of the Messianic Old Testament hope. It has been found that few children realize that Jesus lived before his human birth, but at no other time than in childhood can this truth be so easily received. It might be made more impressive by putting in the upper left-hand corner of the school black-board some rays of light in yellow chalk and writing in it, "Christ before Christmas," and on seven steps of a stairway the words, one by one, reading upward from a picture pinned to the board of Jesus in the manger, "Jesus said, I came down from heaven."

Illustration and Application

1. The Saviour-King revealed to rich and poor alike.
 2. His Christmas peace only for those who will to do his will.
 3. Having found Jesus and his peace, we are to tell it out.
- There were Shepherds keeping watch by night over their flock.* The first direct proclamation that the long-expected Messiah had come was made, not to priests, but to plain people, night workers engaged in lowliest toil. Less directly, by a star, by "the light of nature," as it were, the same truth was revealed to the learned and perhaps rich Magi far away among the Gentiles. Thus at once Jesus was shown to be the Saviour and King of Jew and Gentile, poor and rich, ignorant and educated. But very special pains were taken century, in which Christ has wrought miracles upon nations, transforming our savage, idol-worshipping ancestors into Christian gentlemen. These centuries point us to Christ as one who can transform us also, however sinful. The glory of Christ's cradle is outshone by the glory of his cross of self-sacrifice, and the glory of his world-conquering crown. That glory we may share if we will keep step with him.

Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy. Young people, with a passion for joy, need to be told again and again that Gospel means glad tidings; that is, Christ comes to the world and to every soul, not to lessen, but increase its joys. Religion takes away none but counterfeit joys, whose dregs are headache and heartache. "Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember," and nothing pleasant to remember does religion take away. It gives us the good times that do not go off with the having. Alas, that even in the celebration of Christ's birth, so many turn to the devil for joys! The wickedest dens of sin and sorrow put out the Christmas tokens as bait to capture victims.

A Saviour which is Christ the Lord.—The word "Lord" is often used in the New Testament as a synonym of master, or rabbi, or sir, but not so in this case manifestly. The angel proclaims "a Saviour who is the Messiah Jehovah"— for this the words meant unquestionably, as heard by Hebrew shepherds. In the Old Testament "Jehovah" is the name of the Divine One as revealed, and sometimes seen, in distinction from the unseen God. The angels told the shepherds that the Messiah had come and was none other than the Jehovah who had in visible form visited Abraham and Moses. Delitzsch says on, "Abraham believed" that "belief in the Heavenly Father and in his son Jesus Christ in the New Testament is belief in Jehovah in the Old Testament, for Jehovah (Jahve) is the name of that God who has revealed himself as the God of salvation since (Gen. 3: 15).

This shall be a sign, ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger.—The "sign" was that he should be like other children, wrapped in the swaddling clothes with which the mothers of that land and age bound up their babes, the only difference by which he could be distinguished being that his cradle was lowlier than any other, a manger or cattle trough. In one of the few really worthy Christian poems of recent years, Father John B. Tabb represents the angels as hunting long for the Christ who had left heaven, and whom they expected to find in some glorious planet—anywhere but where they found him at last:

A voice from sphere to sphere—
A faltering murmur—ran,
Behold he is not here!
Perchance with man,
The lowlier made than we,
He hides his majesty.

Then, hushed in wondering awe,
The spirit held his breath,
And bowed; for, lo, he saw O'er shadowing death,
A mother's hands above,

Delighted with "The Speaking Oak"

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I received the premium, The Speaking Oak. After looking over it, we are all very much pleased with it, and expect to spend many pleasant winter evenings reading the stories. We have now about eight books received as premiums. With these and the Bibles received, we can count the number of years we have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (which is about eleven or twelve years), and we like it more and more every year.

to assure the lowliest that no bars of caste would shut them out of any blessings Christianity was to bring. Shepherds having first received the message, Jesus was shown to them in a cradle even ruder than that of their own babes, born like a "lamb" indeed in a barn, and cradled in hay, because none but a beast could be crowded aside to make room for his mother and for him. Still more he was endeared to the poor when his mother presented him in the temple with the offering of doves, allowed only to the poor, and when he spent long years as a carpenter, and when, even as a rabbi he had "not where to lay his head"—true of him at birth in his borrowed cradle and at death in his borrowed tomb. How confidently the homeless poor may seek a home in his sympathetic heart! Surely, the Church that was founded by a Carpenter must never be too "nice" to welcome his fellow-workmen to hearty fellowship.

The glory of the Lord shone round about them. Greater than the glory in the sky, that startled the shepherds, is the glory that we behold of nineteen rays, each ray a Christian

SCENE ON THE MARCH TO BETHLEHEM AT CHRISTMAS TIME

CHRISTMAS IN BETHLEHEM

BETHLEHEM stands upon a hillside, from the heights of which you can look down upon a fertile valley, rich with succulent grasses; the green sward sweeping upwards to the foothills, which are terraced into vineyards and circling olive-groves. It is one of the garden spots of Palestine.

The town itself appears imposing, with its white buildings clustering round a central group of churches but all sense of grandeur vanishes, once you enter the labyrinth of crooked and narrow streets.

If you arrive at Bethlehem on Christmas Eve, you will find the great square between the Hotel Bethlehem and the Church of the Nativity filled with people—a cosmopolitan crowd, whose varied, and often bright-hued, apparel adds to the picturesqueness of the scene.

Christmas in Bethlehem is a universal holiday. All business is suspended. Everyone is in the streets. The crowd to-day is little different from the vast concourse, which, nearly twenty centuries ago, thronged the little city in obedience to the edict that "all the world" was to be taxed. Once again, there is no room in the houses for the accommodation of late arrivals, and many of those who have come to attend the church services, or to take part in the out-door festivities, will spend their night in the open air.

Year after year, the same scenes are enacted at Christmas in Bethlehem. When the square seems to be so packed that even movement has become a struggle, a company of Turkish soldiers emerge from the barracks and march to the middle of the square, dividing the throngs, by you know not what magic art of compression. A few minutes later, a mounted officer appears, literally carving a way for himself by striking to right and left with the flat of his sword. You wonder at the docility of the patient peasants. Your wonder increases when, following the officers, come two soldiers on foot, who carry whips of hippopotamus hide, and with a curious admixture of determination and good humor, lash at the legs of those who are not quick enough at falling back. But a path must be made through the crowd for the procession of carriages, in the first of which is seated the bishop, who represents the Patriarch of Syria and Palestine.

Before the carriages, gallop a small body of horsemen in bright uniforms—and, as the church is neared, the doors of the sacred edifice are thrown open, and a procession of priests and choir-boys emerges to meet the prelate and to clothe him in the gorgeous vestments of his office.

The Church of the Nativity was built by Constantine, early in the fourth century, and it was restored in the eleventh century by the Crusaders. On the red pillars which support the roof, the knights inscribed their names, and brave deeds, and crests; but their curious writings have been almost obliterated by time. The whole interior of the church is now brilliantly decorated with the costly furniture of modern ecclesiastical art.

You are shown a marble star in the floor, corresponding (say the monks who act as your guides), to the point in the heavens where the Star of Bethlehem hung on that memorable night and directly over the scene of the nativity.

The service on Christmas Eve does not commence until half past ten at night. At midnight, a curtain hung above the high altar, is drawn back, and a niche

THE SILVER STAR, WHERE CHRIST WAS BORN
Showing the Altar in the Cave of the Nativity is revealed supporting a cradle, in which lies the image of the Holy Child. The long service proceeds. At half-past two, the little babe is borne round the church in solemn procession to receive the adoration of the worshipers, and the curious glances of others to whom this part of the service is a senseless mummery. The waxen doll is gowned in lawn and lace.

While the service is going on, many people have passed the night in the grotto of the nativity, which is reached by a flight of stone stairs leading from the church. You descend these steps, and are conducted by a long passage into what was originally a cave—a grotto carved out of the limestone rock on the ridge of the mountain. Here, you are told, was the scene of the Saviour's birth. The grotto is of moderate height, and entirely lined and floored with marble. Thirty-two golden lamps, all of them gifts of Christian princes, are here kept burning day and night, and fill the chamber with their soft effulgence. The precise spot of the nativity is indicated by a "glory" in the floor, composed of marble and jasper, and encircled by a wreath of silver, about which is inscribed in Latin, "Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary."

An altar, fixed in the rock, spreads over it. The original manger is believed to have been carried to Rome; but removed about seven paces from the star, another manger is preserved, carved out of marble, and which corresponds, both in shape and size, to the original. In front of this is the Altar of the Magi, on which incense is kept continually burning.

During the long hours of the night preceding Christmas the grotto is filled with worshipers. Christmas dawns as a day of festivity and rejoicing—the sun shines warmly down on that little city where the Son of God first appeared upon the world, to give to man his wonderful message and to bring "life and immortality to light."

The Sunday School "Lesson-Helper"

A Sunday School teacher says: "I am a very busy woman. My week is so full of work that I do not have the time I could wish to devote to the preparation of my Sunday School lesson. I have to look it over Saturday nights after public libraries are closed. As I cannot afford to keep many reference books, I considered thoughtfully which I should choose as giving at once the most condensed and the widest range of information. If I had had encyclopedias at command, I had not time to choose a subject through its many volumes. I simply needed brief definitions and descriptions of places and things found in the Bible. I decided upon your Bible Dictionary as filling my requirements, and as being within reach of my purse. I simply renewed my subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and added fifty cents, and lo! on my table here, the busy woman's lesson-helper lies under my hand; and my class as well as myself are the gainers." The book, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, three dollars.

"The Speaking Oak" is Grand

DEAR EDITOR:
I have been a subscriber to your valuable paper for ten years, and the premiums I have received in that time are to me invaluable. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the best paper I ever saw. Accept my thanks for the present just at hand—The Speaking Oak. It is grand.

THE CHRISTMAS PROCESSION TO THE CHURCH OF THE NATIVITY

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

LISTEN, children! During the winter months I am going to devote this corner of the paper to you.

I know it is very hard sometimes, during the cold and wet weather, to amuse yourselves indoors, particularly on Sunday afternoons; and so there has grown up in my mind the idea that it would delight you and please your parents if a portion of this paper were given up every week to your entertainment.

The principal feature for the present will be puzzle pictures, and some curious questions which you will find it great fun to answer.

I want it to be understood quite clearly that this column is to be devoted to amusement, not to lessons. But you will find that you have to study your Bibles pretty closely to give the right answers to some of the puzzles, and this is just what I want you to do.

I have bought a number of beautiful prizes for those who show the greatest skill in solving the problems, and I want you to tell all your friends, boys and girls, about this new feature of the paper.

You will find full particulars about each competition below, but this being the first week, I will mention one or two points here.

Competition No. 1 is called "a Scripture problem." The artist has illustrated a scene, which is described in one of the earlier books of the Old Testament, and about which you have often read. What you have to do is to write a short description, not more than twenty words in length, in your own language, of this scene.

The second competition is called "Curious Questions." The prize will be awarded to the competitor who sends the best answers to the greatest number of questions. The replies should not be more than one hundred words in length each.

A reader may enter one or both competitions. They are entirely distinct. The only condition is that no competitor shall be over fourteen years of age. There is no rule against asking the help of others—but the answers must be sent in your own handwriting.

COMPETITION No. 1—A Scripture Problem

This picture illustrates a scene in the Old Testament. Write a description of it, in your own language, not using more than twenty words. Read the rules carefully.

Remember one point. We shall be delighted to hear from our young readers whenever they care to write, but do not send any letters at all with your competitions. The correct answers to these competitions and the names of the prize-winners will be published in the paper. Some new puzzles will be set next week.

COMPETITION No. 1

A Scripture Problem

The picture represents an incident described in one of the earlier books of the Old Testament. Write a description of it, using not more than twenty words, in your own language.

COMPETITION No. 2

Curious Questions

1. Where in the Bible do you find that some of the Jews had special winter residences?
2. What tree were the Jews forbidden to cut down in time of war?
3. Where in the Bible is there given a detailed list of a woman's wardrobe?
4. How many different colored horses are referred to in the scriptures?

Copy out the questions and write your answers after each. If you cannot answer all do as many as you can.

RULES.

No competitor shall be over fourteen years of age. The same reader may enter either one or both competitions.

In Competition No. 1, the answer must be written on a postal card or on one side of a sheet of paper. The names, age and address of the competitor must be written at the top.

In Competition No. 2, the competitor must answer as many of the questions as possible. The name, age and address must be written at the top of the first sheet of paper, and all the sheets must be numbered. The writing must be on only one side of each sheet of paper. No answer may be more than one hundred words in length.

No reader may send in more than one attempt for each competition.

All attempts must reach this office by December 24. The correct answers and the names of the prize-winners will be published as soon after that date as possible.

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

PRIZES.

COMPETITION No. 1. The prize for the best description of the picture will be a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. To the fifty readers sending the next best answers, we will give a beautiful book, entitled Choice Readings and Recitations for the Family Circle, bound in rich white vellum, with holly decorations in green, red and gold.

Christmas Thoughts from the Late Dr. Talmage

The Bethlehem Nativity

—AT THIS season all Christendom celebrates the birth of Christ. Step down out of your comfortable surroundings into the chill December night of Bethlehem. Two plain people are huddled in a village barn after a walk of eighty miles, too long a trudge for one in poor health. No lords of state awaiting in antechamber, as when other kings are born. No messengers mounted at the doorway ready to herald the advent from city to city. No medical skill in attendance. No satin-lined cradle to receive the infantile guest.

But a monarch born in the hostelry called the house of Chimham, the night with diamonded finger pointing down to the place, the door of heaven set wide open to look out; from orchestral batons of light, dripping the oratorios of the Messiah; on lowest doorstep of heaven the minstrels discoursing of glory and good-will.

Soon after the white-bearded astrologists kneel, and from leathern pouch chink the shekels, and from open sacks exhale the frankincense and rustle out the bundles of myrrh. The loosened star; the escaped doxology of celestials; the chill December night aflush with May morn; our world a lost star, and another star rushing down the sky that night to beckon the wanderer home again, shall yet make all nations keep Christmas.

God's Provision for Man

—FOR US THE peach-orchards bend down their fruit and the vineyards their purple clusters. To feed and refresh our intellect, ten thousand wonders in nature and providence—wonders of mind and body, wonders of earth and air and deep, analogies and antitheses; all colors and sounds; lyrics in the air; idyls in the field; conflagrations in the sunset-ropes of mist on the mountains; and the "Grand March" of God in the storm. But for the soul still higher adaptation; a fountain in which it may wash; a ladder by which it may climb; a song of endless triumph that it may sing; a crown of unfading light that it may wear. Christ came to save it—came in a stable manger, came with a cross on his back; came with spikes in his feet; came when no one else would come, to do a work which no one else would do. See how suited to man's condition is what God has done for him!

Man is a sinner; here is his pardon. He has lost God's image; Christ retraces it. He is helpless; Almighty grace is proffered. He is a lost wanderer; Jesus brings him home. He is blind; and at one touch of him who cured Bartimeus, eternal glories stream into his soul.

The Tonic of Hardship

—CHRISTMAS WEATHER the best of weather. Snow is the sign of good crops next summer. So, many have yielded wonderful harvests of benevolence and energy because they were for a long time snowed under. We must have a good many hard falls before we learn to walk straight. It is on the black anvil of trouble that men hammer out their fortunes. Sorrows take up men on their shoulders and enthrone them. Tonics are nearly always bitter. Men, like fruit-trees, are barren, unless trimmed with sharp knives. They are like wheat—all the better for the flailing. It required the prison darkness and chill to make John Bunyan dream. It took Delaware ice and cold feet at Valley Forge, and the whizz of bullets, to make a Washington. Paul, when he climbed up on the beach of Melita, shivering in his wet clothes, was more of a Christian than when the ship struck the breakers. Prescott, the historian, saw better without his eyes than he could ever have seen with them. Mordecai, despised at the gate, is only predecessor of Mordecai, grandly mounted.

Two Kinds of Christians

—WE HEAR a great deal in our day about the higher life. Now there are two kinds of higher-life men, the one admirable, and the other most repulsive. The one kind of higher-life man is very lenient in his criticism of others, does not bore prayer-meetings to death with long harangues, does not talk a great deal about himself, but much about Christ and heaven; and he gets kindlier and more gentle and more useful, until one day his soul spreads wing and he flies away to eternal rest, and everybody mourns his departure. The other higher-life man goes around with a Bible conspicuously under his arm, and is a nuisance to his own pastor when he is at home, and to other pastors when he is away from home; runs up to some man who is counting out a roll of bank bills, or running up a difficult line of figures, and asks him how his soul is; speaking at a religious meeting he has a patronizing way, as though ordinary Christians were clear away down below him, so he had to talk at the top of his voice in order to make them hear. Not so was that Jesus who was born in Bethlehem on the first Christmas Day.

ON THE MAKING OF PRESENTS

THE dweller in a great city finds the weeks just before Christmas full of brightness and charm. Every shop window is crowded with beautiful objects, and the streets are thronged with happy people, intent on buying things to make other people happy. A spirit of good-will is abroad, and the streets feel it, and are overflowing with contagious gayety. Young and old, rich and poor, share the spontaneity and enthusiasm of the hour, and money is for once valued most as the medium by which the good and generous St. Nicholas sends blessings to his friends.

The country cousins who are too far away to take trips to town, are by no means left out in the present holiday anticipation. No gifts to the city exceed those that are sent from the farm: the barrels of red apples, the crisp, white celery, the golden squash, the plump turkeys, that are to make us the Christmas dinners, come from the country, and have a flavor of the fields and the hills that the city would miss, but for the great spaces of open land and tilled meadows in the green background. Country women in these days shop by mail, to excellent advantage, and also their fingers produce many articles that city women like to buy. Especially in the single line of knitted articles, country women may send most acceptable gifts to their friends in town. A beautiful white or crimson sweater is a gift equally prized by and appropriate for either sex. A knitted or crocheted petticoat is a treasure, and mittens, and other soft woolen comforts, never come amiss.

A subtle fragrance of sentiment clings to the gift that one personally makes, and renders it of a little more worth than the gift that is bought over a counter. In any gift, the amount of thought and pains contained in it count heavily as against money value alone. "The gift without the giver is bare." Self-denial sweetens a present to the one who makes it, if not to the recipient.

In the matter of presents one should never overlook the age, the taste, and the personality of the one to whom a gift is sent. Husbands often receive Christmas gifts which give them little individual satisfaction, but which do help along in adorning the house, as the giver meant they should. Is it not better to be quite genuine and sincere in this matter, and, when choosing a present for one of the family, choose it either for the person's self, that it may confer real gladness, or else confess that the lamp or the chair or the table was bought with the ulterior motive of making the parlor prettier or the living-room more comfortable, and not with any thought of an individual's happiness?

Children should not be denied the opportunity of making presents as well as of receiving them at Christmas. To teach selfishness, as some of us do, by our anxious effort to bestow toys, books and coveted garments upon our children, while we quite ignore the pleasure they ought to have in giving to others, is a great mistake. Every holiday season should be a training for the children in thoughtfulness and sweet generosity.

When Dolly Breaks Her Head

James Whitcomb Riley's tender poem, about the little girl who has had her doll broken, and is breaking her heart over the calamity, has struck a responsive chord in many a heart. The griefs of children are short-lived, but are terrible while they last. When dolly falls downstairs, or is blown out of the hammock by a scurrying gale, or in any way comes to misfortune and breaks her poor head, her little mother sobs and cries with as sincere a heartache, as she may some day know over a far heavier loss. Let us compassionate the children and share their griefs, soothing them with real, not simulated sympathy. Not to sympathize in a child's sorrow is to have a very hard heart indeed.

The Reading Habit

If we can ever free the minds of people in general from one ancient and traditional impression, namely, that to read is to waste time, we shall do much to enlarge the area of happiness in the ordinary home. Women do not sit at the sewing machine for hours and suffer from scruples of conscience, nor make wonders of embroidery, nor paint, nor clean house like beings inspired, and feel called upon to

DORIS

WHEN Doris is ready to walk in the street,
Her dress for the outing is trim and complete,
And she's just a sweet picture, from head unto feet.

With a warm little hood that's tied under her chin,
And a snug, wadded coat that tucks Doris all in,
And her bag and umbrella,—let winter begin.

He will do her no harm, for she's shielded and ready,
Our darling, Miss Doris, with eyes brave and steady.
One day she'll have lovers,—Jack, Phillip, or Teddy.

apologize for their course. But most women, if they take a book in the day time, seem to have an uneasy feeling that they ought to make some excuse for the occupation.

Now, the reading habit, unless one spends her time in reading frivolous and silly books, is a distinctly excellent habit, of which nobody should be in the least ashamed.

A Country House-Party in Winter

FORMERLY, a general impression prevailed that the summer was the only time when the country could be enjoyed. Gradually, a change has come about, and this season there will be many a pleasant holiday-gathering in the country.

Granted a well-warmed and lighted house, with an open fire to give an aspect of cheer in the living-room, what can be more ideal than a Christmas party out of town. Space has grown so very limited, and so numerous are the residences that are made in flats and apartment houses, that city folk cannot exercise much hospitality. To entertain overnight is a great tax, and there must be planning and doubling-up, to make it practicable. People in the country have houses of several stories and many rooms.

A party invited to spend some days in the country should be carefully selected, and, as a rule, should include a married couple, a pair of lovers, and several young people who are congenial. The out-door sports will be determined by the weather, and skating, sleighing, driving, or walking, will be the order of the day. Indoors, there may be any amusement which all can enjoy, and there should be music, and evenings of story-telling around the hearth.

For a story-telling evening, turn down the lights, and let the groups gather around the blazing logs. Everybody can remember a story, if the endeavor is seriously made. The story may be of personal experience, of travel, or of remembered reading. Stories of ghosts, or of thrilling escapes, are frequent when the wind is raving outside, the shutters rattle, and the fire-side is brighter by contrast.

If you resolve to invite a party of people to your home, state definitely when you wish them to arrive, by what train or boat, and how long you expect them to stay. Visits are not now left to accident. It is customary to assign to them a limit. During the tarrying of guests under one's roof, the house and the host's time, should, in a way, be at their disposal, and everything should be done to make the visit a great success. If children are asked, special pains must be taken to provide for their gratification, and by some agreeable indoor game give them diversion when they are not occupied outside.

FORGIVE AS YOU WOULD BE FORGIVEN

Forgive as you forgiven would be,
The word came straight from Jesus' lips,
Until the pardoning heart is yours,
Your love will know eclipse.

Forgive as you forgiven would be,
The scornful look, the word unkind;
Let nothing in your spirit lurk,
Unlike the Master's mind.

About Answering Letters

Decidedly the best time to answer a letter is soon after receiving it. One is then aglow with enthusiasm; one has been brought into actual vital communication with her friend, one has something worth while to say. Put the letter aside for a week or a month, and there will be difficulty in reviving the interest, which was alert when the letter was first received.

AUNT PRUDENCE'S CATCH-ALL

—LIVY. How can you overcome selfishness? By doing all you can for others and putting your own wishes resolutely aside.

—MOTHER. Some children have an antipathy to wool next the skin. They should not be compelled to wear flannel if it causes irritation.

—DIXON. If you have an orderly wife why not help her by putting your belongings away properly. She will think your mother did not bring you up well.

—JERUSA. For a week's visit, you are getting very well with a single skirt and a nice waist to relieve the commoner one. Take your own medicine.

—ROSALIE. Don't be unreasonable. A young woman of twenty—your sister—cannot be ordered about as if she were six.

—AMIE. I don't know how to keep my ink, in which I paste all sorts of things, from getting so dry that you are more orderly. I recommend you to use a bottle of ink for proper classification.

CAN WRITE THEM.

Calkins, the Story Teller.

Mr. Franklin W. Calkins, of Wyoming, Wis., who writes many interesting stories for the Youth's Companion, says:—

"Food can make or unmake a writer. For a number of years, living the sedentary life of the writer and student, I suffered all the ills of nervous dyspepsia. I could eat nothing in the morning save a dry crust of toasted bread and a cup of weak coffee. For my dinner at 6 o'clock, I had been in the habit of eating rare beef steak, the only food from which I seemed to get proper nourishment, but no meal was taken without the after pangs of indigestion; I was beginning to get disgusted with life.

"About a year ago a friend suggested Grape-Nuts, telling me of the benefit he had received from the food, and I began with it as directed; I found immediate relief from my indigestion, and in a short time my dyspepsia left me entirely. I have now used Grape-Nuts for a year, and have had no trouble with my stomach, having eaten many enjoyable dinners.

"I find in fact that all you say for Grape-Nuts is true, and it is certainly the food for brain workers, and the truth of your claims is proved in my own case. I have no appetite for meats."

$1.00 Worth of FREE Music

If there is a piano in your home we will send you without charge seven splendid musical compositions, two vocal and five instrumental. Three of these selections are copyrighted and cannot be bought in any music store for less than $1.00. With them we will send four portraits of great composers and four large reproductions of famous paintings of musical subjects.

Why We Make This Offer

We make this offer to reliable men and women to enable us to send information regarding our Library of the World's Best Music, which is absolutely the best collection of vocal and instrumental music ever published. It contains more music, more illustrations, and more biographies of composers than any other musical library. It is for general home use and enjoyment, as well as for students. Send your name and address, and ten cents in stamps to pay for postage and wrapping. When writing, kindly mention this periodical.

Answers to Question of the Week

Are there any serious objections to legalized compulsory arbitration as a means of settling labor disputes, and thereby averting strikes and lockouts?

Full Power to Pass Such a Law

No. The Federal and each State government has full power to pass and enforce legislation conducive to public peace and domestic order. Compulsory arbitration deprives the contending parties of certain rights, but the same is true of almost every written law, and when such restrictions of personal rights are necessary to promote the best interests of the people at large, there can be no question as to the right of and the power of law-making bodies to pass and enforce the same. To deny this position would be to deny the great principle of majority rule—to deny that in a republic the governmental power comes from the people and not from the sovereign body.

G. W. A.

Trades Unions Should Incorporate

The principal, and indeed the only objection that can reasonably be urged against compulsory arbitration, is that it violates the spirit of the Constitution by abridging the liberty of the citizen. This difficulty, however, can be overcome, and at the same time the fullest freedom of action preserved. Every trades union should be incorporated, and should be regularly officered, as other incorporated bodies are officered. All members of the Union should be subject to the laws of the incorporation, and should be familiar with the penalties incurred by the breaking of those laws. Any disagreement between employers and employees, or between union contractors and their employers, should be referred to the union officers for instructions. If the Union can adjust the matter by advisement, well and good; if not, then let the Union direct that the case be taken before the Compulsory Arbitration Board, local, State or national, as is proper under the circumstances. The Union then becomes a principal party to the arbitration, as representing the workers; the employers (or capitalists) are also represented, and both parties (union and employers) must abide by the finding of the arbitration court. If the case goes against the employer, he must submit, or pay the penalty imposed by the court for non-submission; if against the workers, the Union (being an incorporated body and a definite subject of legal action), must yield, or pay the penalty imposed out of union funds, just as though the judgment were against a bank, or a business concern. It is useless to attempt compulsory arbitration unless both sides can be held equally responsible for carrying out the decision of the court. At the present time, the workers do not have the proper standing in such judicial proceedings. It would be impossible to enforce any finding where one of the parties to the case consists of a number—very often a large number—of men who are so situated that if a distasteful decision were rendered, they could ignore it without the slightest danger of suffering any penalty for their act. Were the Union (not the workers individually), the party in question, it would have to respect the decision or abide by the consequences. Another point in favor of the incorporation of the Unions, is that such a step would compel general recognition of Unions in all official proceedings, a result which Mr. Mitchell, in the recent coal arbitration proceedings, appeared to consider a most important and desirable one.

A. McMANUS.

Only the Unjust Would Object

Arbitration is the only remedy thus far discovered for labor troubles. It is objectionable only to those who lack confidence in the justice of their cause, and are therefore reluctant to accept the decision of an impartial tribunal. The vehemence of these objections will be in exact proportion to this lack of confidence. Apart from such objections legalized compulsory arbitration is objectionable only because in our system of government no place has been provided for it—the founders of our republic not having foreseen the conditions that have now arisen. But, on the general principle expressed in the ancient maxim, "The safety of the State is the supreme law," it would seem entirely proper for the highest court of the nation to declare that Congress has power, "for the safety of the State," to enact a code of arbitration, to create tribunals and to enforce decisions.

J. G. OSBORNE.

Some Difficult Obstacles

There are serious objections to such a law, which are difficult to overcome. A man has the right to conduct his business as he chooses or to discontinue the same, to hire whom he will and to discharge his employees at his own pleasure. These are termed the rights of the employer. In the same way a man has the right to enter the employment of anyone who will hire him and to cease working when he sees fit. He can choose his trade and the place of his employment. These are termed the rights of the employee. These rights of employer and employee are given by the English law, and have been secured by centuries of conflict with unwilling despots. It would be necessary in enforcing a compulsory arbitration law, to compel the parties to abide by the result of the arbitrators. This naturally takes away from both their individual rights. History has shown that curtailing the liberty of an intelligent people has not proved a successful method of advancing the cause of good government.

GEORGE I. TETER.

Objections Not Insuperable

There are serious objections to legalized compulsory arbitration, but they are not insuperable. Compulsory education, compulsory vaccination, and all prohibition of evils have serious objections; but the good of the State and the protection of the citizen demand this legalized compulsion. When strikes and lock-outs rob deserving citizens of their rights, such as food, fuel, and transport, then the enlightened public sentiment will uphold a law to compel arbitration. There is no objection that can live in a "land of freedom." The preponderance of labor as well as of capital is now on the side of arbitration; and, if made compulsory, the majesty of the law will sit upon the undisputed throne of even-handed justice.

A. W. LEWIS.

It Would be Unconstitutional

Yes, the principal one being that it is contrary to our constitutional privileges. However much we may feel the need of such legislation, however much we would welcome it as adding stability to our business life, we are still compelled to admit that it would be interfering with personal freedom to a greater extent than contemplated by our constitution. Legalize compulsory arbitration and the personal factor remains—the miner cannot be compelled to mine coal, nor can the operator be compelled to allow the mines to

Still Nearer to Nature

A new era in talking-machines. The Victor, which already was far in advance of every other, now produces more tone and better tone—firmer, louder, clearer, more natural, richer, truer; it brings out many of the finer qualities of tone that were not noticeable before. The Victor Talking Machine has become, more than ever, a musical instrument.

It also looks better; is more substantial and easier to manage.

Sousa said of the old Victor, "The Victor Talking Machine is all right." And it took the Gold Medal at the last great Exposition.

Better than ever now. The rigid arm has done it.

Sold by more than ten thousand stores throughout the United States.

be operated under terms which others have dictated. Before arbitration can be effective, both employer and employee must agree to submit to the result; as was done in the recent Pennsylvania coal strike.

ERNEST SMEDLEY.

Political Corruption the Only Danger

The possibility of bribery and political corruption controlling the members of the court of arbitration are the only serious objections that can arise. This could be provided for, in a measure, by a careful selection of men, whose integrity and honesty of purpose had already been proven, and by the strikers being permitted to select one-half of the members from their own ranks.

ALICE C. BOYNTON.

The Example of New Zealand

No, we cannot possibly see any serious objections to legalized compulsory arbitration. The condition of business in the United States during the past six months has done more to bring forward the question of compulsory arbitration than all the theories that have ever been advanced. Compulsory arbitration laws have been in force in New Zealand for the past six years, and must have Student, Woodstock, Conn. Will you kindly tell me who invented the telescope and who invented the microscope?

The principle of the microscope was known in the days of the ancients, and through all the gradual steps that have led up to the perfection of the modern instrument it is impossible to point to any one man as the inventor. Similarly, the discovery of the telescope has been the subject of fruitful discussion. It is certain the principle was known in the earliest days but no practical telescope, was made until 1608, when one was constructed in Holland. The credit of the original discovery has been claimed on behalf of three persons—Hans Lippershey, Zacharius Jansen and James Metius.

The number cannot be estimated, because the sect called Second Adventists does not, by any means, include all who hold that belief. All the Plymouth Brethren, for example, hold it, also a large number of Baptists hold

What Do You Think of This?

HAS it ever occurred to you that the best, most acceptable, and most economical Christmas gifts are those offered by The Christian Herald? Say, for instance, that you wish to make five hearts happy for a whole year with an investment of only $3.00. Can you do it? Certainly; and this is the way it is done:

Your subscribe to The Christian Herald (with the Family Art Gallery Free) and to any three of the following magazines, altogether for only $3.00. You send The Christian Herald to one friend, one magazine to another, another magazine to a third, and still another magazine to a fourth, and our marvelous Family Art Gallery to the fifth. Five superb gifts for only $3.00. And these gifts differ from others in that, the whole year round, they remind your friends of your tender thoughtfulness.

The magazines which we offer in this combination of $3.00 for The Christian Herald and Our Family Art Gallery and three magazines, are as follows:

| | Regular Price | | Regular Price |
|----------------------|---------------|--|---------------|
| Harper's Bazar | $1.00 a year | Little Folks | $1.00 a year |
| Success | 1.00 a year | Record of Christian Work | 1.00 a year |
| Frank Leslie's | 1.00 a year | Current Anecdotes | 1.50 a year |
| Everybody's Magazine | 1.00 a year | Railroad Men | 1.00 a year |
| The Cosmopolitan | 1.00 a year | The American Boy | 1.00 a year |
| Current History | 1.50 a year | Our Art Gallery goes FREE with every Subscription. | |

Or, if you prefer, you may substitute a copy of Dr. Banks' great work entitled The Hall of Fame, for any one magazine; or Dr. Iglehart's Speaking Oak and 300 other Tales of Life, Love and Achievement, for any other magazine.

Thus you have an opportunity of making five hearts happy with an outlay of only $3.00, and a liberal selection of presents to choose from. Can you do better or as well elsewhere? Remember Harper's (Ladies') Bazar when making your selection.

Miscellaneous Questions

G. I. U., Bradley, S. D. 1. Was the Bible ever wholly lost, and if so, for how long a time? 2. Has any light ever been shed on the identity of the lost ten tribes of Israel? 3. What was the name and age of the cousin of Queen Victoria who attended the coronation of King Edward VII?

1. The completed Bible was never lost. You probably refer to the earlier books, which disappeared and were found in the Temple in the time of Josiah (see II. Kings 22:8). Many scholars believe that the book referred to in the passage was the book of Deuteronomy, not the other books of the Pentateuch and Joshua and Judges. 2. Nothing authoritative. An effort has been made with some ingenuity to identify them with the Anglo-Saxons, but the identification cannot be considered proved though there are many reasons in favor of the

it. Probably the number in the other denominations is not so large in proportion to their membership. Those who do not expect the personal reign, however, anticipate a time when Christ will reign over the whole world, as he now does in the hearts of his people, and when everyone will acknowledge him as a supreme King.

A. W., Philadelphia. It is not Boston, but Berlin, which is known as the "City of Intelligence"—an allusion to the high degree of culture possessed by its inhabitants. Boston is sometimes called the "City of Notions."

A Christmas Gift for a Man

"The Story of the Hall of Fame, with its handsomely printed and beautifully bordered pages, is a Christmas gift beyond compare," writes a friend. "My copy, done up in red tissue paper, tied with green ribbons—a bit of holly stuck in the bow—will be on my husband's table when he opens his eyes Christmas morning. This book fills a long-felt want to folks who don't know just what to give a man. I had given pencils, slippers and ties Christmas after Christmas and was at my wits' ends when this book came with my year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—all for $2."

How to MAKE Indian Baskets

THE LATEST SOCIETY FAD

Christmas at the Bowery Mission

ONCE again the Christmas-tide draws near, and the customary preparations for the festival are being made on a generous scale at the Bowery Mission, in New York.

As early as three o'clock on Christmas morning the Mission doors will be thrown wide open, and steaming hot coffee, with large, appetizing Bath buns, will be served to the crowds of homeless men and boys, whose destitute circumstances frequently compel them to walk the streets to keep them from being frozen. These unfortunates number far into the thousands, but sin and vice will have their harvest as long as poor, weak humanity yields itself to their treacherous allurements. Many of these men and boys would gladly return to homes where fathers and mothers, well-nigh broken-hearted, are ready to welcome them, but they either lack the means, or fear that they may be humiliated and repulsed by those whom they have so grievously offended. The liberty for which they hungered seemed so sweet when they started away; but they have had a hard time of it, and would be in-

On the afternoon of Christmas Day, another great event, which is every year eagerly looked forward to by the poor East Side tenement children, will take place. Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree will gladden a thousand little hearts and make them feel that Santa Claus is no respecter of persons, but loves the children of the poor as well as those of the wealthy. What a sight it is to see a thousand of these little tots, all too thinly clad, with pinched faces and large, wistful eyes, on the very tiptoe of expectancy, watching every movement, while waiting to hear from Mother Bird's lips the welcome sound of their own name, that calls them forward to receive, perhaps, the only gift they will have on that glad day, which to others is one unbroken succession of delightful surprises. May God help the children of the poor at this Christmas time!

A fitting conclusion for the day is the turkey dinner in the evening. At this gathering Superintendent Hallimond and Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," preside, while Professor is now ready for delivery, and the completed work excels even our most sanguine expectations. Last year we stated that our Art Portfolio was unquestionably the choicest, richest, most artistic, most attractive premium ever offered by this or any other paper. This year we set ourselves the task of surpassing our own best efforts. We were determined that the success of 1901 should be followed by the greater triumph of 1902. We have triumphed. But notwithstanding the surpassing beauty and the intrinsic value of our Family Art Gallery, it goes free, as far as the supply will permit, to every subscriber in the exact order in which the subscriptions are received. We deal impartially with all, on the principle, "First come, first served."

Ten Great Masterpieces

reproduced in their original oil color effects! The world's most famous paintings in all the great art galleries of America and Europe, and many noted private collections, were carefully considered by art experts before these ten masterpieces were finally selected. Just think! Ten beautiful, separate pictures, in all the glory of their original colors, unmounted, without margin, measuring in all 1,000 square inches, offered free with every yearly subscription to the brightest, best family paper in the world. The subscription price is only $1.50. The Art Gallery includes reproductions of Shenn's "Lost Sheep," Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," and Schreyer's "Arab Warriors," the originals of which are valued by the Metropolitan Museum of Art at $86,000. We are proud to be the first to make such an unheard-of offer. We know what we are saying (and you will agree with us when you receive the paintings) when we insist that equal value was never given for the money.

Send in your subscription promptly, now, to-day, whether it be a renewal or a new subscription, and make sure of the Family Art Gallery. It is better to be a month ahead of time than a day too late. You will always regret if you miss this opportunity.

deed thankful could they only once again be at home with their loved ones! Now they are wanderers on the streets, with no one to care for them, while at home, from sorrowing mothers' lips, can be heard the constant, sad refrain—"Where is my wandering boy to-night?"

Reader, if you have a boy adrift in the world, for his sake, do something to help the Bowery Mission to bring cheer and warmth on Christmas Day to the countless multitudes that will crowd its doors, eager to be among those who shall enter while yet there are food and drink for the famishing. Help somebody's boy! Perhaps, somewhere else, your own wandering lad may be wanting help, and the help that comes in such a time of need is precious beyond words.

But we will return to the Mission Christmas programme. While breakfast is going on upstairs, down in the basement the busy workers of the Bowery Mission will fill the baskets of mothers and children, to whom, but for the generosity of the good Christian people of this land, Christmas would only bring into stronger relief the misery which is theirs. This year it is hoped that there will be enough to fill a thousand baskets, and thus bring happiness and hope to a thousand families.

Victor H. Benke, one of the Mission converts, enlivens the event with the grandest music the magnificent organ is capable of yielding. Five hundred hungry men join in singing hymns, while in the kitchen adjoining the Mission extensive preparations are going on to provide a feast that shall remind them of the happy and innocent days when they sat around the table at their father's home, where there was "enough and to spare." Just as Mrs. Bird gets through telling the men how good God is to provide so plentifully for their wants, at a signal from the Mission Superintendent the men arise and sing, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." Then come the white-aproned waiters marching in, laden with trays that are burdened with a tempting display of carved turkey, big slices of bread, apples and fragrant coffee. This being served, Superintendent Hallimond, in a little after-dinner talk, points the throng of happy and grateful men to One who can save "from the uttermost to the uttermost."

This Christmas bounty at the Bowery Mission, is a work, dear friends, for which we ask your help. Give what you can. God will surely repay it a thousandfold. All contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, where they will be promptly acknowledged.

A Christmas-tide Hymn

"When they saw the star, they rejoiced."
Matt. 2:10

G. H. S.

G. H. SANDISON

1. Stars of the night that deck the sky, Where, in your deeps may shine—
 2. Star of the Man-ger! Vision bright! Where dost thou hide thy rays?
 3. Light of His love, di-vine-ly pure, Wilt Thou the message bring, Ra-diant and pure—the Star whose light Beamed o'er the Child Di-vine?

 Shine with thy message sweet to-night, As in the old-en days.
 Ere that day break when He once more Com-eth as Zi-on's King?

Where 'mid the host may we dis-cern— Tok-en of love so rare—.....
 Rise, O bright Star! Shine forth again, And let the na-tions know.....
 High from the crest of Ol-i-vet Shall thy soft splendor fall.....

Heaven's signal bright, a world to turn Un-to a Sav-iour there?
 Je-sus will yet re-turn to reign, Worshipped by all be-low.
 O-ver a world where, surely yet, Christ shall be All in All!

LESSON XXV

Exercise 68

The following Exercise contains all the Contractions

Exercise 69

The following Exercise contains all the Contractions.

1. "Knowledge is power" is not a proverb we are in danger of forgetting, especially when it is represented how remarkably wide is its application to everything we do. 2. Knowledge which is essential to our highest welfare should never be neglected; nevertheless it is essentially true that the instruction of reverend teachers, and the doctrine they publish, do not with uniformity influence irregular lives so greatly as those interested could wish. 3. Reform in this respect, and the reformation (of the) evil, is the natural, we may say the characteristic and especial desire of every sincere reformer. 4. We need not think it impossible in the domestic sphere, however unimportant, to exercise a peculiar influence for good. 5. This may be found to have influenced the character of some mistaken one, and led him to see the mistake (of the) life he was leading, and to decide to do nothing for the future to which objection could be taken that it was inconsistent with what is expected: such conduct would not be unexpected, nor show inconsistency. 6. We acknowledge the truth (of the) proverb in respect to the Government, and whether the established constitution is that of a republic with a president at the head and republican institutions, or a kingdom with parliamentary rule, the importance of political knowledge to the elector is readily understood, and all parties are unanimous in their efforts (if not entirely disinterested) to establish it. 7. The leaders (of the) party forming the Government are naturally desirous that information (of the) actions they perform, which may contribute to its firmer establishment, should be published, but the publication of particulars of their policy in the official organs may be thought uninteresting, though not improbable. 8. It may have, indeed, a different reception from that anticipated, or rather, than seemed probable. 9. Though this may, not improbably, give the reverse of satisfaction, and be considered unsatisfactory by Parliament, still one object of representative institutions is that those elected to rule should give to those they represent the most authentic information on public events, and this is not impracticable. 10. If not done immediately, there must be good reasons for neglecting the immediate and regular publication of interesting news.

The student having advanced to this stage, is now advised to read some book printed in the Corresponding Style of shorthand, and we recommend for this purpose either of the following: Phonographic Reader or Select Readings No. 1, both containing forty-eight pages of engraved shorthand notes. Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of 20 cents, or the two for 40 cents. Orders should be sent direct to Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXVI. will appear in the issue of Dec. 24.

A Builder of Negro Churches

ST. PAUL'S Colored Mission, inaugurated in 1893 by four devout negroes from the South, who knew how much such a work was needed by members of their race living in the Tenderloin, has survived nine years' of sharp struggle for existence. Driven from place to place, finding shelter in this or that dance-hall, almost exhausted again and again for lack of funds, it has stood the stress of hard fortune and opposition, and now promises to be established on a firm foundation. Sabbath services, week-day meetings and Sunday School are held regularly in the Odd Fellows' Temple, West Twenty-ninth street, which was once a church edifice, and which is, therefore, a more fitting shelter than the mission has heretofore known. But the rent is very heavy, and is met with difficulty. The membership consists mainly of respectable working people, who, after serving their employers all day, assemble at their place of worship and spend their remaining strength in united effort to advance the Master's cause. Many negroes, going to their moral and spiritual ruin in the Tenderloin, are drawn into paths of righteousness by efforts put forth here. Much want and wretchedness is relieved by these faithful, but poor, followers of the Lord; and neglected children of their race are cared for. The pastor, Rev. Percy J. Wallace, is a remarkable man; he was called to this charge by people here who had known him in Virginia as a builder-up of churches. Several churches in that State owe their existence to his devotion, enterprise, and industry; in the erection of one sacred edifice he saved $400 to his people by his labor, drawing up all the plans and specifications and looking personally after all details of construction. He served as pastor of two churches, which he built up, while taking his course at the Virginia Union University (a Baptist institution for colored people), from which he graduated in 1901, taking a degree. St. Paul's Mission depends upon voluntary contributions for its existence; the membership is very poor. Any letters addressed to Rev. Percy J. Wallace, 242 West Sixty-third street, will receive prompt attention.

REV. PERCY J. WALLACE

A MONEY-MAKING FEATURE FOR CHURCH

Church Choir Sonophone Band

WHAT USERS OF SONOPHONE CORNETS SAY

Mr. C. W. DIEHL, Precursor of Harlem Presbyterian Church, 125th St. and 5th Ave., New York City, says: I have used the "Sonophone Cornet," and much pleased with them. It is quite surprising to find these instruments of such variety of good work. They are certainly invaluable for Church entertainments.

Mrs. J. Von Ross, Organist and Choir Leader of M. E. Church, 80 East 116th St., New York City, says: I have used the "Sonophone Cornet" with grand success. It was a big surprise and unlooked for at the concert.

Mr. Ed. S. Lynch, Sunday School Superintendent of Episcopal Church of Carlton St., says: For a money-making feature for Church purposes, the "Sonophone Cornet" is the best I ever tried, and I predict a big future for it amongst Churches without a paid choir. The cost of space is expensive in this paper, or we should quote you many more such letters from persons associated with Church work.

YOU CAN PLAY IT—IF YOU CAN TALK

No training or tedious practice. It is mastered in a few moments by any man, woman, or child, nothing like it ever before produced. The Sonophone principle converts the voice into a musical instrument of brilliant quality and fine tone, (phone) part acts as a sounding board, and allows the player to produce effects from the softest to the loudest tones. It calls forth hidden beauties from the world of sounds, and opens a new realm in the musical world.

A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED with a "Church Choir Sonophone" Quartette. Every Church in the United States, without a paid choir, should organize Church Choir Band as a means of earning money for Church purposes, and render "Sonophone Concerts" as they invariably draw full houses. To you, personally, the cornet affords unlimited pleasure in your home, as you can play it with telling effect without the aid of other instruments. It is an excellent accompaniment, as it blends beautifully with the piano, organ, or any string instrument.

69c. SPECIAL 30 DAY OFFER. To introduce the Musical Marvel, and to give you a chance to test our instrument, and prove all our claims we will send the SONOPHONE CORNET, metal, brass finished, highly polished, 12 inches long, 6 inch bell, with instructions how to play, by mail postpaid for 69c. We make this extraordinary offer believing that all interested will organize concerts. This is a grand offer and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, post office money order, a bank draft payable to our order.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM XXXIII The Word-of-God Psalm

4. For the word of the Lord is right; and all his works are done in truth.

4. He loveth righteousness and judgment:

6. By the word of the Lord were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.

Man works and it is done, but God speaks and it is accomplished. The heavens and all twinkling stars were made by the breath of his mouth. No wonder his counsel standeth forever. This Psalm is for the queer folk who put the word and wisdom of men above that of the Almighty; who exalt reason and human thought above the inspired gift to the world—the Bible.

PSALM XXXIV The Kept-People's Psalm

6. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles.

7. The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.

19. Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all.

None but preserved and kept saints can appreciate the full power of this song. It is Jude, verse 24, and Psalm 91, crowded in the life of a penitent sinner and given out in psalm shape. Deut. 28:7 with Rom. 8:28, are a part of this Psalm, though widely separated from it. One hundred years hence it will have a fuller meaning.

PSALM XXXV The Psalm for the Persecuted

1. Plead my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me.

2. Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for mine help.

3. Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me: say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

Here is a Psalm where the hags of night and dogs of hell get after God's children. Persecution has not been confined to martyrs. It is easier to die in the fire than to live in it. The burning power of falsehood and lies is greater than faggots about a stake. The twentieth century opens with Psalm 35 true to many. Soon will come the open door of the King's Palace for such, and persecution will close forever.

PSALM XXXVI The Light-and-Shadow Psalm

4. He deviseth mischief upon his bed; he setteth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil.

Queer Psalm this. Mischief-makers on beds, and sinners getting double light. The day of a Christian has no night, and the night of a sinner no day. One lives in continued sunshine, the other in continued shadow. So it will be in Eternity—deeper darkness for the damned, but brighter light for the saved. Psalm 36 is for both the blessed and the bad.

will be more fully than ever in 1903 the distinctively bright, virile and wholesome periodical of America. It will be always vitally interesting. It will take hold on human experience with a firm grip. It will show that a magazine may be thrilling without being sensational. Everybody's presents strenuous and clean life in every phase, through fact and fiction.

TRUE STORIES OF IMPORTANT EVENTS. There is always an "inside" to a notable occurrence; and it is almost invariably a story of intense human interest.

The True Story of the Organization of the Steel Trust
The True Story of how Theodore Roosevelt became President

The True Story of the First Railroad Merger
And similar articles to be announced later

SIGNIFICANT AUTOBIOGRAPHIES

The Autobiography of an Insurance Agent, who must know human nature intimately.
The Autobiography of a Bank Cashier, who uses keen insight into the ways of borrowers.
The Autobiography of a Naval Officer, who regards civil life as a lower order of existence.
The Autobiography of a Member of Congress, who reveals many things that are seldom told.

THE BLOWING OF AN OIL BUBBLE.

By S. MACREYNOLDS, exposing the methods of promotion "sharks," who victimize the public with stock in visionary oil wells.

STORIES OF STRENUOUS LIVES.

The true stories of men whose personal feats outdo the exploits of heroes of romance.

THE BOHEMIAN MUSICIAN.

By JAN KUBELIK. The brilliant young violin virtuoso tells the story of his own career.

WORK WITH THE HANDS.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, of Tuskegee Institute. This is the most important message of the author to his generation.

STORIES OF WESTERN RIVER LIFE

Mr. G. W. Ogden's stories of life and adventure on the great river steamers which half a century ago plied the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio make a picture of an intensely interesting phase of our national development.

NATURE STUDIES.

By Professor J. M. COULTER, of the University of Chicago, A. R. DUGMORE, H. C. MERWIN, and others. Being intimate observations of nature from the scientific, pictorial and nature-loving point of view.

NEW YORK THE MOST INTERESTING PLACE IN THE WORLD.

A SOLDIER'S FOE

Knocked Down by Unsuspected Enemy.

Coffee so affects the brain and nerves that proper nutrition is interfered with and the final ending is frequently nervous prostration. "During the Spanish-American war, I went with my troop to Chickamauga," says Lieut. J. G. Talbot of Springfield, Ills. "If there is any one place on earth where one drinks more coffee than another it is in the army. It is a soldier's 'back bone,' and I can assure you that I drank my share. After several months of hard drilling my health gave out, the chief cause being coffee, bad food, over-exertion and heat.

On the advice of the surgeon, I tendered my resignation and with my heart full of regret and my nervous system shattered, I returned home. Almost the first thing the doctor whom I consulted advised me was to quit coffee. That was the first intimation I had that coffee had anything to do with my condition. The next thing was 'what shall I drink?'

My wife's mother used your Postum Food Coffee and knew how to make it right, so I tried it and grew very fond of it. My nervous trouble soon left; my old time health came back, and that Fall I gained so in flesh that the boys on returning after 'muster out,' hardly knew me. Quitting coffee and using Postum did wonders for me."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

World-wide Evangelization*

A REPORT of this year's deeply interesting Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement, was published in this journal soon after the sessions concluded, but it was not possible in the space that could be spared, to give more than a brief mention of addresses full of important facts and suggestions. To do justice to these addresses, has required a volume of nearly seven hundred large pages. It has now been issued under the authority of the managers of the Movement, and will be found an exceedingly interesting and valuable work. Among the eminent men who took part in the Convention and whose addresses are reported in the volume, are Dr. J. Ross Stevenson; Dr. Arthur Sweatman, Bishop of Toronto; Dr. John Potts; Dr. S. H. Wainwright; Prebendary Fox; Dr. E. E. Chivers; Dr. J. W. Millard; Dr. Egbert Watson Smith; Dr. Elmore Harris; Bishop Charles B. Gallo-way; Hon. Samuel B. Capen; Dr. Franklin Goucher; Dr. Maurice S. Baldwin; Dr. C. H. Daniels and Mr. John R. Mott, who has made missionary work in all lands his life study. Besides these, such eminent missionaries as Bishop Thoburn, Dr. Ament, Dr. F. Howard Taylor, Dr. S. L. Baldwin, Dr. John N. Forman, Dr. C. F. Reid, and many others gave addresses on the work in their special fields, which are of permanent value.

At the Convention, the missionary problem was considered in all its aspects, not only in relation to the work in heathen lands, but to the supporting work at home, showing how ministers, editors and private Christians might aid in the mighty effort. The movement needs the sympathy and the active co-operation of Christians in their prayers, their enlistment of recruits, besides the collection of money to enable missionaries to take advantage of the doors opening now on every hand to the heralds of the Cross. These co-operative labors, which are so indispensable to missionary success, were fully discussed, and the best methods of conducting them were outlined. The report of these discussions contained in this volume are therefore practically helpful to all Christians, who are anxious to aid in the glorious task set before the world by the Student Volunteer Movement in "the evangelization of the world in this generation."

To every one who takes an interest in the history and progress and aims of foreign missions, which should include every one who bears the name of Christian, this volume may be cordially commended as furnishing information at first hand on all missionary fields. The special peculiarities and characteristics of each field are described by men and women who have actually labored there and the respective needs of each are presented with personal authority. It thus forms an exhaustive compilation of missionary lore invaluable to the student of missions. One chapter especially is of thrilling interest. It relates the rise and progress of the Student Volunteer Movement, one of the most momentous and influential agencies of our day. Its full significance is not yet fully appreciated, but when its effects come to full fruition, the story of its inception recorded in this chapter will take rank as an epoch in the history of the Christian Church.

*World-wide Evangelization, the Urgent Business of the Church: Being the addresses delivered before the fourth International Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, held at Toronto. Pp. 691. Price, $1.50. Published at the offices of The Student Volunteer Movement, 3 West Twenty-ninth Street, New York.

SUNDAY SCHOOL Teachers do not need an introduction to the famous work, which every year, for now more than a quarter of a century, the Peloubets have placed at their service. Teachers in every section of the country and of every denomination have grown familiar with its style, and have learned to appreciate its utility. It aims to supply the teacher, not only with a commentary on each lesson and a plan of teaching it, but with a sketch of the historical setting, and a list of works which shed light upon it. The volume for 1903 maintains the high standard of its predecessors, and is unusually rich in illustrations.

THE CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

The Manger, the Starting-Point of Influence and Power That are to Transform the World

A PART altogether from the New Testament account of the Nativity, the birth of our Lord must be regarded as the most momentous event in history. Even persons who reject the supernatural altogether, who refuse to credit the account of the virgin birth, the wandering star, the singing angels and the divine admonition to Joseph, must acknowledge that the birth of Christ was an epoch from which must be dated a new tendency in the world's course, a new spirit in human development. As we look around at the various beneficent institutions and organizations, the object of which is to relieve suffering, and to alleviate the burdens of poverty and sorrow, we perceive how many of them can be traced to the influence of Christianity. The world of the twentieth century is a very different world from the world of the earlier centuries, and the difference has been growing more marked as time has passed. It is very different in knowledge and in the power acquired over nature and in the adaptation of natural forces to human purposes; but it is different, more than all these, in the spirit of helpfulness, kindness and beneficence which has come into it.

Slowly, and with many setbacks, the new spirit, starting from the Manger, has taken possession of the minds of men, and has gone through the world, changing its standpoints, exorcising its hatreds and evil passions, and elevating its ideals. It is astonishing, when we analyze this progressive change, to find how silently and unobtrusively the work has been done. We can understand how great changes might be worked by treaties between powerful governments, and how enlightened lawmakers and mighty armies might alter the conditions of life; but this change has had no such aid. Indeed, the periods in which governments have attempted to aid in advancing it, have been those in which its progress was slowest and least genuine. There must have been some element of mighty force in it, which it is difficult to explain, except by the supernatural. A student trying to understand the changed conditions of humanity, without the clue furnished by the New Testament, might naturally and logically have arrived at the conclusion that the Supreme Being had interfered in some way nineteen hundred years ago, to give a new impulse and a new direction to the course of the human race. The epoch was so marked, the subsequent progress so regular, the results so stupendous. It should not surprise any one to hear that at that time a celestial visitant proclaimed, "I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people."

The Christmas message fell on unsuspecting ears. No one could imagine the blessings to the human race conveyed by that Child lying in the manger. It was he who was sent to reveal to men the wonderful news of the fatherhood of God. It was he, who, combining in his own person the divine and the human, could bring men into connection with God by imparting to them the Holy Spirit. God was to be to them henceforth not a far-away Being indifferent to their welfare, but a Being intensely concerned for their development—One who had taken pains, and had made extraordinary efforts to bring them into harmony with himself. Not then, not even now, do men realize all that is implied by the motive which brought Christ as a babe into the world. They were to learn through him who lay a babe in the manger, that he who was willing to seek the higher good, to lose his material life, should save his spiritual life to all eternity. He had come that men might have life, and have it more abundantly—the real life, of which existence in the body is a mere passing incident. His words and his own life were not only to bring them nearer to God, but to make them Godlike, in love and sympathy with one another.

THE HOME LIFE BUILDING,

Our offices occupy sixteen rooms on the fifth and sixth floors, overlooking City Hall Park, the Post-office, and Brooklyn Bridge—35 minutes from our properties.

$5,000 for $510!

We put the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one to induce every reader of The Christian Herald to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which will actually give you $5,000 in return for your investing $10 down and $6 a month until you have paid $510.

We have been advertising Brooklyn lots for two years past, and we have sold probably a thousand to Christian Herald subscribers.

There are 50,000 Christian Herald readers who could invest and would invest if the Secretary of the United States Treasury made the above statement instead of a private corporation, and yet the private corporation in this instance may be just as capable and just as reliable as the Secretary of the Treasury. We know we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the fact to you.

$500 invested for a child will put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple will come close to making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them five times better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

Now, won't you sit down and give us the chance of telling you our story? It won't take long, it will be interesting; we will send you some astonishing facts about New York and its marvellous growth that will interest you. You don't object to getting this, do you? All right, sit down, right now, not to-morrow—"to-morrow" ruined Napoleon—to-day, now, this minute. A penful of ink, a postal card, a minute's time, may bring you a fortune. Isn't it worth the while?

Remember, our offer also carries a free deed in case of death, a non-forfeiture agreement, a guaranteed increase of 25% within one year from Nov. 1, 1902, a free round-trip to New York (east of Chicago, or like distance), the highest class of park-like improvements free, your money back with 6% interest if not found as represented. They run on steel glazed Bicycle Ball-Bearings, making them by far the lightest running machines ever produced. A child 12 years old can run them as easily as any woman. The kind that has positive feed and even tension, makes lock stitch exactly the same on both sides; sews anything from finest silk to heavy canvas.

Improved Foot Attachments, so simple, scarcely any instruction required; are sent in complete sets with every machine. Capable of doing 18 operations, the greatest range of work on any machine.

Free Samples of the work beautifully done by the attachments sent to any lady on request.

Our Catalogue has been prepared at great expense and is the finest published, with large art reproductions of complete line and many styles of machines. Golden oak coloring reproduced in our catalogue to show exactly how they appear. One of many testimonials, as follows:

TRULY DELIGHTED.

The Homer Young Co., Ltd., Toledo, O. Springfield, La., Aug. 4, 1902.
GENTLEMEN: The Sewing Machine arrived at depot on the 1st, and I have it in possession since the 2nd, and to say that I am pleased would scarcely do justice, as I am delighted with it, and had it fully equal in every way to machines that have been purchased here for twice the amount paid. I shall no doubt call on you when in need of supplies of any kind and will cheerfully recommend you to any one who may need a new Sewing Machine. Thanking you for courtesies received, I am truly and respectfully yours, MRS. C. SETTEON.

INDIA'S GRATEFUL ORPHANS

FROM Dr. D. H. and Mrs. Ada Lee, of Calcutta, comes the picture, reproduced here, of a merry little girl, who is in the Orphanage under their charge. Fifty-five of these orphan girls and twenty-five boys are being supported by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "It would do your hearts good," Mrs. Lee writes, "to see these children, whom your readers have enabled us to save alive. Two years ago they were such sick, miserable skeletons, that it seemed impossible they could survive. Now they are all so happy. Many of them have learned to read the Bible and to sing Christian hymns, and their sweet voices help to render our services attractive. Some of the bigger boys are useful in distributing tracts on the streets and at the bathing-places. Some of them are almost ready to support themselves. They have proved so tractable and docile, and so eager to learn, that we believe their disposition must be an answer to the prayers of the consecrated people who are paying for their support. May God bless you all."

It will be remembered that Mrs. Lee lost all her own children in the terrible disaster at Darjeeling, not long ago. She acknowledges, with Christian pathos, that in this work she is doing for the orphans, there has come consolation into her heart. Her children are not and cannot be forgotten; their loss has made her sorrowful, and the tears often flow as she thinks of them; but if it had not been for the orphan work God gave her to do, her grief would have been almost unbearable. Through this, the wound has been healed, and in ministering to the children, her own soul has been comforted.

A "Shelf of Patriotism"

A friend writes: "For many years I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for myself and others, and thus secured two or more of the premiums offered annually. They have always been better than promised. In permanent value, I place your Teachers' Bible, Red Letter Bible, and Red Letter Testament, of course, above all others. They are simply priceless. Next to these, I must tell you that I rate your Story of the Hall of Fame. In my library, I have given it a niche in the centre of what I call my 'Shelf of Patriotism,' above which I have the Stars and Stripes draped. The case of 'Americana' which this shelf crowns occupies the only decorated corner in my 'room of books.' Sometimes I give my children and young friends an 'evening with great books,' and talk to them about the authors of these and about what they contain. I have found that they pass Shakespeare, Dante, Milton, and Homer and all novels by for this shelf, which tells them in picture and story about their country. The new addition has been examined with so much interest and has given such unbounded delight that I am resolved to get several copies for boys and girls, the choosing of whose Christmas gifts has perplexed me." The Story of the Hall of Fame, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2. Extra copies $1 each.

THE GOSPEL OF HUMANITY

Peculiarities of the Gospel According to Luke

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN this Gospel of Luke we have the genealogy of Christ, not reckoned from David the king, and Abraham, the head of the Jewish nation, as in Matthew, who represents Christ as the King, but right down from Adam, the first man. Matthew tells us of the honors paid to him at his birth, as befits a royal personage; but Luke tells us the circumstances of his birth in much detail, with all the family surroundings—the human side, which brings Christ so near to us.

It is Luke who tells us of the unbelief of Zachariah, and how he was made dumb until the time that the child was named. It is Luke who tells us that the same angel Gabriel, who appeared to Zachariah, appeared also to Mary, telling her that she should bear a son, and should call his name Jesus; and he also relates the meeting of Mary and Elizabeth, those two women, both elected of God so specially for the part which was given them to take in the first coming of God's Christ, and of his forerunner. He also tells of the circumcision of Christ, of his presentation in the temple, and of the aged Simeon and Anna.

We realize, as we read this Gospel, how very really the Son of God came in our nature; born as we are born, carried in arms as all of us have been, slowly gaining strength, for he "increased in stature;" learning to walk, learning to speak, repeating no doubt the words he heard spoken, like any other tiny child; then learning to read, to work, to use the hammer and the saw, just like other children in Nazareth. Our beloved Lord was in all points made like unto his brethren, very really child among children, man among men. He could not accomplish his ministry without being very man; for in him all humanity was included, in him man would anew be tested. He came to reopen and to settle the question of sin and death on the cross, as well as to prove in his own person how man, who of himself could do nothing (John 5:30), would nevertheless, by faith in Him who dwelt in him, and did the works through him (John 14:10), live a life in full accord with the will of God.

It was no accident which brought Joseph, the lineal descendant of David, through Solomon, with Mary, to whom he was betrothed, away from Nazareth to Bethlehem, just at the time when Jesus would be born. Mary was also descended from David, and was the daughter of Heli (Luke 3:23), the son of David (ver. 31) through Nathan; but as the genealogy was always reckoned through the father's, not the mother's ancestry, it is written in Luke that the Lord Jesus was (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, although in Matthew Joseph is shown to be the son of Jacob, who was the son of Nathan (comp. Matt. 1:15, 16; Luke 3:23, 24). In an English genealogy it would have been (as "was supposed") the son of Joseph, who was the son-in-law of Heli. Christ must be born in Bethlehem, the city of David, to fulfil Micah v. 2, and it was no accident that this fact was brought to notice by the inquiry of Herod, when the wise men from the East came with their inquiry for the newborn King of the Jews.

It is not as a kingly personage we see the infant Jesus in the Gospel of Luke. The inn, or rather inn-yard, where Joseph and Mary encamped when they came up to their ancestral city to be enrolled in the great census made by Augustus Cæsar, was so full that there was no room for him; they had to place the little Babe in the manger. It was prophetic; no room for Jesus is the order of things in the world to this day. His birth caused more movement in heaven than on earth. Bethlehem was asleep, and Jerusalem was asleep; the very chief priests and scribes who had answered the inquiry of King Herod, and had declared that the Christ should be born in Bethlehem, were asleep. The Scripture and the words of the wise men had left so little impression upon them, that they never went out of their way to discover whether indeed the Messiah of Israel was born; the coming of the Messiah was not a heart matter to them. What is the Lord's coming again to us? Does it fill our hearts; does it influence our conduct?

But, not far away, some were awake; only a few shepherds "keeping watch over their flocks by night." Herod had lost his chance of welcoming the Messiah; the chief priests and scribes had lost their chance! it was reserved for a handful of shepherds and the wise men from the East to be the only representatives of that humanity for whose sake he came, to welcome the Word made flesh! But in heaven there was a great movement—"the angel of the Lord came upon" the shepherds, and "the glory of the Lord," which had gone up from the Temple in Jerusalem before the city was taken (Ezek. 11:23), "shone round about them," and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them: "Fear not; behold, I bring you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord."

MIZPAH

O thou thy way, and I go mine;
 Apart, yet not afar;
 Thy way is between
 The ways where we are.
 And "God keep watch 'tween thee and me!"
 This is my prayer.
 He looks thy way, he looketh mine,
 And keeps us near.

I know not where thy road may lie,
 Or which way mine will be;
 If mine shall be through parching sands,
 And thine beside the sea;
 Yet God keeps watch 'tween thee and me,
 So never fear,
 He holds thy hand, he claspeth mine,
 And keeps us near.

Should wealth and fame, perchance, be thine,
 And my lot lowly be;
 Or you be sad and sorrowful,
 And glory be for me,
 Yet God keeps watch 'tween thee and me,
 Both be his care.
 One arm round thee and one round me
 Will keep us near.

And though our paths be separate,
 And thy way is not mine,
 Yet, coming to the mercy seat,
 My soul will meet with thine.
 And "God keep watch 'tween thee and me,"
 I'll whisper there,
 He blesteth thee, he blesteth me,
 And we are near.

Sabbath School Prizes

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I must write and thank you for the three beautiful Red Letter Bibles you sent me, and also the eight Red Letter Testaments. I gave them all as premiums in our Sabbath School to those who learned the greater number of Bible verses perfectly. Elaine Jones recited 220; Ella Underwood, ten years old, knew 213; Bessie Spooner 195; other girls from eighty to 165. To say the children were pleased does not express it. All went home happy. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the best Christian magazine I ever read. Rev. Frank Talmage's sermons are glorious. I would not do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for three times its price. I think you will have more new subscribers here before New Year's. I have shown my paper and premiums to my neighbors.

Full of Gems

The Speaking Oak, which you sent me as a premium, arrived a day or two ago, and I thank you for its prompt delivery. I am delighted with it. Have read a part of it, and so far, there is not a dry page in it. Every piece has a tendency to elevate the mind, and to please, amuse, and delight the reader, and encourage one to think; for each story imparts a wholesome lesson. The book is brimful of bright gems, and will certainly prove very acceptable to your numerous readers.

White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. Was formerly athletic instructor of Columbia College, the Knickerbocker Athletic Ass'n, New York, and The Chicago Athletic Ass'n, Chicago. He established the world's record for 100 yards sprint (9 4-5 seconds) and held it unbeaten until 1902. As Mr. Stone has been an athlete and an instructor in physical culture for 32 years, and is himself a physically perfect man at 52 years of age, it will readily be admitted that he is thoroughly capable of teaching others the science of self-development.

No apparatus whatever required and does not overtax the heart

Conscientiously and systematically follow our instructions and we can promise you a fine, strong, well-developed physique, which bears every evidence of perfect manhood or womanhood; a clear brain; a light step; a splendid circulation that will make itself known in a ruddy complexion; bright eyes; sound, easy-working lungs, with plenty of room in which to expand; an increased appetite, good digestion; an active liver; sound, restful sleep; a cheerful disposition; an erect carriage. If you are too fat we can reduce your weight to normal, and if you are too thin we can increase your weight to what it should be. In a word, we give you greater strength, better health, LONGER LIFE. Individual instruction is given in every case.

MEN

WE are successfully teaching The Stone Method of Scientific Physical Culture to men and women in every part of the world. It requires only 10 minutes each day, in your own room, just before retiring, or upon arising, and you will be put to no expense aside from our modest fee.

The Stone Method is a system of concentrated exertion, by which more exercise is actually obtained in 10 minutes than by the use of apparatus two hours. The exercises are rational, moderate, and are taught by an instructor who is thoroughly versed in physiology. Our pupils are of both sexes and range in age from 5 to 85 years. The Stone Method embraces a thorough course in deep breathing without extra expense.

A SUGGESTION FOR CHRISTMAS

This is a fac-simile (much reduced in size) of The Stone School Certificate, suitable for Christmas gifts. Write us for terms.

WOMEN

WOMEN receive quite as much benefit from The Stone Method as men. We can insure perfect health, a good complexion, and, when desired, an increased chest (or bust) development; we can increase the weight or reduce it; we can fill out those hollow places and give the form that beautiful contour so much desired; we can also reduce the abdomen as surely as day follows night.

Mr. Stone is the only physical instructor paying special attention to women and children. He is ably assisted in this department by Mrs. Ellen Walker, who has had a very extensive experience, and who alone opens and answers letters of a private nature. Confidential letters may be addressed

"Mrs. Ellen Walker, care The Stone School."

It is impossible, in this limited space, to convey an adequate idea of the manifold advantages of The Stone Method of Physical Culture. We have prepared a booklet for men and one for women, which explain the system in detail and our plan of mail instruction, and we will send them Free, with Measurement Blanks and Testimonials, to any person who is interested. These booklets contain many photographs from life of those who have perfected themselves physically by The Stone Method. They show what YOU can attain. Write to-day.

SPECIAL NOTICE

On and after Jan. 7, 1903, THE MAIL BAG will be devoted weekly to replying to letters received from readers in all parts of the world. This departure is rendered necessary by the increasing volume of correspondence of this character. Elsewhere in the paper, frequent opportunity will be afforded our readers to unite in a Symposium of opinions on a stated question, dealing with some one of the live topics of the day.

Answers to Question of the Week

Is a clergyman justified in refusing to officiate at a marriage, one of the parties to which has a divorced partner still living?

Refusal Incumbent

He is both justified and bound by his conscience to refuse, if he construes the words of Christ in the Sermon on the Mount, as very many minds feel bound to construe them. To many minds these words make such a marriage a grave sin, even if the ground for divorce was valid. If the divorce was granted for any other than the one valid cause, then such a marriage is absolutely not allowed. In the face of the Scripture teaching on the permanency of the marriage relation, the doubtful construction of the one clause in Matt. 5: 32 lends a very slight ground on which to allow any divorced person to marry during the life of the divorced partner. It is plain that if they have not a right to marry, the minister not only may, but must, refuse to officiate at their marriage. The discipline of the Methodist Church forbids a minister of that denomination to marry a divorced person. "except the innocent party to a divorce for the one Scriptural ground of divorce."

C. P. ATKINSON.

Ought to Officiate

No minister of the Gospel can be justified in making such refusal. His authority to perform the marriage ceremony is based solely on his being a preacher of the Gospel, ordained to the ministry, and under such his powers are defined by the law of the State or country of which he is a resident; and his first duty to his country—in a legal sense—is that of a law-abiding citizen, and, as such, he has no right whatsoever to refuse to perform the marriage ceremony for any parties that are legally competent, according to the laws of the land, to enter into such condition of matrimony. It is solely a question of law—not sentiment.

WM. W. CASE.

To Officiate Would be a Sin

According to the Scriptures, divorce involves sin. The Scriptures name but one sufficient cause for divorce. See Matt. 19: 9; 5: 32. The guilty party cannot be married to another without sin; and a clergyman is justified in refusing to officiate at the marriage of such guilty party; not only so, but it would be his plain duty to make such refusal. There are other passages of Scripture which seem to indicate that no divorced person can be married without sin (Mark 10: 11, 12 Luke 16: 18; Rom. 7: 3; I Cor. 7: 10, 11), and, as a clergyman may refuse such official service for any cause sufficient to satisfy his own conscience, these Scriptures would certainly furnish ample ground for his refusal to officiate at the marriage of any divorced person.

B. F. WHITTEMORE.

Divorcees Must Not Marry

Whether the clergyman is justified or not, would seem to depend on the nature of the reason for which the divorce in question may have been granted. According to the plain teaching of our Lord, neither man nor woman has the right to claim divorce for any other cause than unfaithfulness to the marriage tie, and neither so divorced has the right to marry again. Matt. 19: 9; Mark 10: 12. "Impure and outcast, the guilty being can never again enter a pure and lawful marriage covenant." Of course, there are many dreadful things, the rule laid down by Christ, is a violation of natural, as well as of Scriptural law.

AMELIA HOYT.

No Ironclad Rule

He is not justified in making a hard and fast rule to that effect. When one partner to a marriage has been unfaithful to the marriage vow, the other, if innocent of that crime, is justified by Scripture and by the law of our and be married; but there are many people who crave the blessing of the church on their union, and would not be happy without it. They would regard the refusal as an intolerable stigma on them, and would feel that the church was committing an act of injustice, and so would conceive a prejudice against it. The clergyman has the right to refuse the sanction of the church to a union in which one of the parties has been pronounced guilty of wrongdoing; but even in that case the refusal ought not to be maintained when there has been sincere penitence.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

A Universal Law Needed

Emphatically he is justified in refusing to officiate in such case. Marriage is a school of discipline, and a person who has not been willing to learn wisdom in one marriage union is not likely to profit by a second. There should be a universal law forbidding re-marriage while one of the divorced is living. People would not then rush blindly into the most solemn earthly relationship. Mental and spiritual affinities would then direct alliances. The clergyman who unites a divorced person wittingly to a new partner listens not to God's voice against it.

CLAUDE M. SEVERANCE.

One Minister's Custom

The mere fact of a divorced partner being still living, would not of itself justify a clergyman in refusing the ceremony of marriage, because the divorced party, for aught that appears, may have been divorced on good Scriptural grounds. Generally speaking, however, it may be said that a clergyman who tries to keep people right by refusing or not refusing to marry them, puts himself in a very embarrassing position. People who want to do wrong in the matter of divorce or marriage will tell as many lies, as a rule, as may be needful to get what they want. Several years ago I made up my mind to marry any parties who might bring the proper license. I did this on the ground that people must take their own responsibilities. No other person can assume them in such a case, and the sooner this lesson is learned the better.

AT THE GATES

"A time of charity, a time of cheer; the poor may surely hope, for Christ is here! Christ in the body of his church will list, and lend his aid to me and mine, I wist. His very Cross is on the stately door—ah, open! open! shelter, we implore."

Grandly the organ peals, o'erhead sublime the gladsome bells repeat their deep-voiced chime Cedar and pine and holly, red and green, will glorify within the gracious scene.
The verger asketh: "Who is at the door?" The woman answers: "We are Jesus' poor."

There is no room?—silk garments rustle past. Christ is not here?—He is. Help cometh fast.

The freezing ones are warmed, the hungry fed, the heavy-hearted to our Lord are led.

such as desertion, drunkenness, cruelty, insanity, that may justify a separation of husband and wife, but still they do not leave either at liberty to seek divorce and to marry again. This, of course, sometimes bears hard on the individual, but the general good demands it. Since by some mysterious law the two sexes are perpetually preserved in an approximate equality in point of numbers, it is plain that the permanent marriage of one man with one woman, is the permanent law of nature. Divorce, then, except as sanctioned by land, in obtaining a divorce, and being liberated, has the right to form another union, even during the lifetime of the guilty party. To withhold that right would be to punish the innocent for the sin of the guilty, which is contrary to the fundamental principles of justice. Why should an innocent person be condemned to a solitary life on account of an offence committed by another? The clergyman might plead that his refusal to officiate need not prevent the marriage, inasmuch as the couple might go to a justice of the peace

Bride of Promise of the New Japan—A Group of Young Girls who have received a Modern Education

EMPRESS HARUKO THE "GOLDEN-HEARTED"

WHAT SHE IS DOING FOR JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE WOMEN

NOTHING is more remarkable in the East than the social and intellectual progress which Japan has made in recent years, and this is largely due to the brilliant and accomplished Empress, Haruko, who has evidently mapped out for the maids and matrons of her country a future full of opportunity for culture of the highest order.

LITTLE JAPAN

As the little Haruko, daughter of Prince Ichijo, the Empress was liberally educated, according to the standard of old Nippon. A maiden of high degree, was taught Cha-nu-yo (the ceremony of tea-drinking), dancing, how to play on the samisen or koto; how to write poetry and arrange flowers. Painfully, carefully was she instructed in etiquette (a branch in which Europe and America might well take lessons from Japan), and above all things was she trained to obedience; obedience to father, husband, son, by turns, were life's "three great religious duties." The daughters of the poor learned to labor in the rice-fields and to perform many heavy tasks usually relegated to men. In certain sections, woman still carries an unnatural part of industrial burdens. In some high-class homes, she still leads a life of seclusion and intellectual torpor. Yet, all the same, the evolution of Japanese womanhood goes on with marvelous rapidity, the Empress being the leader.

The woman who blackened her teeth and shaved her eyebrows at marriage is a shade of the past. At her wedding, some thirty years ago, the Empress conformed to this custom, but soon ceased to so disfigure herself.

From her latest Photograph

By a Japanese Artist

THE EMPRESS HARUKO

She went to too great an extreme in adopting Western ideas, when she exchanged the healthful, artistic, economical national dress for European costume, not nearly so becoming to her and her ladies as hakama, kimono and obi. An appeal went from this country, signed by Mrs. Cleveland and other leading ladies, who hoped "Japanese women are too patriotic to abandon what is beautiful and suitable in their national costume, for wasteful foreign fashions." The Empress had defended the change in a famous Court circular. Doubtless she found the new attire trying, but patriotism, not caprice, impelled her. Japan was possessed by almost pathetic earnestness in copying Western usage.

The Empress' first audience to the envoys' wives in 1873, and her appearance by the side of her husband in the state coach in the streets of Tokio, in 1890, when the new constitution was declared, marked a new era in the history of the East; and when, on the evening of the street parade, the Emperor, bowing, offered her his arm to conduct her to a twin arm-chair in the state dining-room, Japan led the Orient in recognition of woman's rightful place. Now the Empress has her corps of secretaries and readers; and she keeps them busy. Her social and benevolent activities are legion. She devotes a part of each day to informal audiences; she faithfully visits her schools and hospitals and patronizes charity bazars. Though she wears European dress, she purchases, by preference, Japanese fabrics, and her laces are for the most part supplied by her own school. Our picture of her is a rare one, since it shows her in ancient national costume, which she may have donned for some special function or festival, or possibly just to have a portrait of herself so arrayed.

A visit to the "Peeresses School," founded by the Empress of Japan, in Tokio, is not easy of accomplishment—hence not frequently described; and the following account of the institution, by Miss S. D. Doremus, Secretary of the Woman's Union Missionary Society of America, will be read with interest:

"A special permit must be secured, and it was therefore with a due sense of privilege that I entered the grounds, tastefully laid out, and enclosing the only red brick building I have seen in Japan, designed for a similar purpose. Its dimensions are on a scale that is sufficiently large to accommodate 500 girls, who daily assemble there; and class-rooms, gymnasiums and playgrounds all be-token thought for the highest development of Japan's future wives and mothers.

Disheartening Depreciation

PROV. 20: 14: — "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth"

DO you see that Jerusalem gentleman wending his way in and out among the crowded booths and stores? Do you see him stop and pretend to be examining some article, as though he were making up his mind whether or not to buy? He is, in truth, stopping to hear a conversation which is taking place between an old Hebrew merchant, and a young man who has just arrived, perhaps from the far East, with camels laden with a large assortment of expensive shawls. "Well," says the young man to the old merchant, "how much will you give? I have put every cent into this enterprise. I must sell those shawls right away. My creditors are beginning to crowd me hard. My men want their pay right away. Those shawls are the best that I could get in the East. They cost me $20,000 cash. I have come a long distance with them, and you certainly ought to give me enough to meet my expenses." The old man shrugs his shoulders. He says, "My young friend, I do not care what those shawls have cost you. They are utterly valueless to me. I do not want them at any price. The moths have got into some of them. For my purposes, they are ruined. Besides that, those shawls are all out of style. They would be a perfect drug upon the market. I wish you would leave the shop. I have a lot of business to attend to, and I have no time to waste." The young inexperienced seller bites his lip until the blood almost comes. Then he thinks of his wife and little babies. He feels he is staring ruin in the face. He knows he must make a sale right away, else he will become a bankrupt. He again says, "Can't you give me anything for those shawls?" The old merchant at first says nothing. Then he answers, "Well, young man, you seem to be in hard luck. I will give you $10,000, if you want me to take the damaged goods off your hands." The tears begin to start from the young man's eyes. He is too brave to show them. He goes to the corner of the street and stands there for awhile to think. While he is there, the old merchant's eyes sharply follow him. Then the young man comes back at last, and says, "I guess I will take your offer. That means I must lose all the money I ever made in my life. That means I will not only throw away six months' hard work, but that now I am utterly ruined. Here is a receipt for the money. Give me the money and let me go to my tent and tell my wife we are both ruined."

A Heartless Triumph

Hardly has the broken-hearted young man left, when King Solomon—for he is the listener—sees the old Hebrew merchant begin to rub together his hands in glee. A broad, sardonic smile overspreads his merciless face. He calls to his partner, and says: "Isaac, come here and see these goods. Did you ever see such beauties? Why, those shawls are worth at least $40,000 clean profit. I never struck a better bargain. That young man simply gave them away to me. Just look at them, Isaac. I bought them for $10,000—at least $15,000 less than they cost. I must go and tell Rebecca how much we have made this morning. $40,000 clear profit. Aha! who would ever have thought that young man could be such a fool?" Is this not a rational interpretation of my text, "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth."

While this conversation takes place between the deceitful old merchant and his partner, methinks I can see a troubled look come over the face of the disguised king, who is standing nearby. Methinks I can hear him soliloquize: "How contemptible and despicable is this wholesale system of swindling depreciations! How deceitful and damning it was for that old merchant to despoil that young merchant. I must embody among my proverbs for the benefit of all my people, a warning against this almost universal and sinful habit." That night, while the great king is sitting alone in his palace study, he takes up his pen and adds another sparkling gem to his casket of scintillating jewels of wisdom. I would interpret the lesson of this text, not only in the merchant's parlance, but also in reference to the wicked depreciations of every walk in life.

Discouraging depreciations are found in the home, as well as in the street; by the domestic fireside, as well as in the Jerusalem stores; in the nursery, as well as in the public market-place. In China, it is never considered gentlemanly or polite for a man to speak well of his relatives. In America, it is also the custom of some parents, brothers and sisters, never to speak eulogistically to any of their dear ones, no matter how much they may be proud of them and their successes. They say they are afraid to praise them; they fear lest they should give them a conceited idea of themselves, and spoil them. Therefore, their policy is to peck at all the faults of their loved ones, but never to commend them for their virtues.

Now, my friends, as far as I can understand our social life, the greatest need of the world to-day, is not for a few more gigantic factories to run night and day, for the manufacturing of scalping knives, and swords, and daggers, and iron-tipped clubs; or for great kilns, where brickbats can be hardened out of dirty clay to throw at our brothers. The great need of the world is not for a few microscopes and X-Ray lenses for magnifying and exposing our brother's faults, and reminding him of his own imperfections. But the greatest need of the world is for at least five hundred million homes to be turned into Christlike pharmaceutical establishments. In those homes, every father and mother, brother and sister, ought to be busy all the time, trying to compound old-fashioned, invigorating allopathic doses of Gospel encouragement. They should be quick to recognize and praise one another's good points as well as their faults. They should encourage each other with words of inspiring good cheer, as well as caution them with words of trenchant warning against the quicksands and the hidden snares of life.

A Parental Reminiscence

If a man's friends do not give him the encouragements he needs for life's struggle, surely his enemies never will. God knows, an average man gets enough knocks from his enemies—enough blows upon his head and heart—to make it absolutely necessary for at least some one to say something pleasant. You do not want your loved ones to start out in life with a depressed idea of their own abilities and capacity for future work, as my father had when he started, which youthful depression he was never able to entirely overcome. My grandfather and grandmother were old-fashioned folks, who brought up their children in the old-fashioned way, never telling them anything cheering about themselves. The nearest to a parental compliment my father ever received, was, when his mother read his graduating speech in the little village paper of Somerville. After she had finished reading it, she turned to my grandfather and said: "David, that speech of DeWitt's must have sounded quite well when he spoke it." Then came the depressing influences of his college and seminary life. With but one exception, all his professors tried to instill into my father's brain the idea that he could never preach. He was so discouraged that he determined to go to a foreign field and be a missionary. He thought that perhaps the "Heathen Chinese" or the Fiji Islanders might be persuaded to listen to his preaching, if he were only able to get into a region where no white man had ever been before. The most surprised being in the seminary—and nearly all the students were dumfounded—was young DeWitt Talmage, when he received a call to the church and parsonage of Belleville, New Jersey. The solemn advice which the New Brunswick professor gave, "You will have to change your style, Mr. Talmage; you will have to change your style," found its echo in the advice of old Doctor Thomas DeWitt, of the Collegiate Church of New York City. After my father had been a short time in the ministry, this great and good man, Dr. DeWitt, after whom my father was named, sent this message to him: "Tell my namesake never to allow his sermons to be published. He may be able to preach, but he certainly does not know how to write." The effect of all this depressing and depreciating advice was such that my father was never able to fully shake off the discouragements of his youth. My mother had to urge him on and on, or, without doubt, in those first years of struggle he would have given up the fight and gone into the law. So, my friends, I urge you never to discourage a young man. You may be mistaken in anticipating his failure. Rather, cheer him with commendation whenever it is possible. Who can tell whether at the end of his career his Divine Master may not pronounce upon his service the "Well done" with which he rewards his faithful stewards.

A Scene at a Coal Mine

Some years ago, by an explosion of fire-damp, four miners were entombed in a coal mine near Scranton, Pennsylvania. Their friends worked a whole night and a day trying to liberate the imprisoned men. At last, the rescuers were about to give up in despair. Just then, the youngest member of the firm rapidly drove up in a buggy. As he leaped out, he cried: "Boys, you have done well! It is only a little work more! Come on, boys, and in a short time we will get those poor fellows free!" He threw off his coat, and grabbed a pick, and began to strike the rock. At the sound of his reassuring voice and example, the other men went to work with renewed energy. The entombed men were soon safe in the arms of their wives and children. To-day, the vast majority of our relatives do not need words of depreciation. Like those miners, digging for their entombed companions, they want words of encouragement, words of good-cheer, words of inspiration, words of assurance, that if they only trust God and do right, certain success will come to every one of them. Their success, may not necessarily come right away, but true success will surely come in time.

Merciless Employers

Discouraging depreciation is often found in the dealings of employers with their employees. Many men and women who are at the head of large establishments, do not like to commend their employees. They say, if you praise a clerk, even a little, that clerk will get too good an opinion of himself and will ask for an increase of salary. Or, if you praise an employee, some rival firm will hear of the commendation, and come and steal your man away. Thus, some men never speak kindly to those who are in their employ. They chronically and systematically growl and find fault with everybody and everything. Their doctrine is that when an employee is afraid of losing his position, he will work harder and more faithfully than if the head of the firm commended him for everything he did well.

Now, such a course as that is not honest or just. The Bible distinctly says that every laborer is worthy of his hire. If a man is paid what he ought to be paid for doing his work, there is no need to fear that he will not do as good work with a few words of commendation, as with the depressing effects of unjust and systematic depreciation. I tell you candidly and earnestly, that chronic fault-finding has the same effect in a factory, or a store, as the cold, dark, drizzling days of November have upon the floral world; while words of kindness and appreciation have the same inspiration upon the flagging energies of the employees, as the inspiring strains of the regimental bands had upon the despairing spirits of the French soldiers, when they were scaling the Alps for their great Italian victories. During the last days of that awful ascent, when the French cannon had to be dragged up by the ropes held in the soldiers' bleeding hands, Napoleon Bonaparte commanded his musicians to keep on playing the most inspiring patriotic airs. So the employers' words of commendation sound in the ears of the worker, like notes of sweetest and most inspiring music, which will make the employees sometimes even double their energies, to merit the appreciation which their employers have expressed.

Unsympathetic Churches

But though words of commendation may have such beneficent results in the employers' dealings with employees, yet it is the settled policy of many a business man not only to say nothing pleasant to his employees, but also to make his clerks live upon as small a salary as possible, until he is, by force of circumstances, compelled to pay them more. I am sorry to say, too, that this spirit of depreciation, this reluctance to recognize and reward merit, is sometimes seen in the relation of a church to its minister, although, thank God, most congregations are not selfish, and are giving their pastors all the encouragement and financial support that they can. A selfish congregation will start in with a system of fault-finding. It will grind the minister down and down. It will make the pulpit a dumping-ground for all its carping and contemptible criticism. It will for years keep its minister upon a starvation salary. Then after awhile, when that minister gets a call from a sister church in a neighboring city, with an increase of two or three thousand dollars salary, that congregation will act as though a bomb had suddenly dropped among them. They will gather around the minister to plead with him with beseeching tears. The boards of the church will immediately meet and vote to raise the minister's salary $2,000. Resolutions will be passed begging the minister not to leave them. If that minister is so valuable to the congregation now, why was he not appreciated before? If the congregation could raise the salary $2,000 now, why not before? If the congregation could pass commendatory resolutions now, why not before? Oh no, that is not the policy upon which many a selfish church and many a business establishment are run. The policy which is almost everywhere in vogue is that against which Solomon is giving the warning of my text. It is to say as few pleasant things as possible, to pay as little as we can to those who are in our employ, and then to spend the rest of our time in boasting how much we have been able to get for little, or for practically nothing.

Depressing depreciation is annually driving thousands, and hundreds of thousands of poor men, women and children into a life of crime, and into a quick-step march to a premature grave. The public is guilty of complicity in the evil. It not only encourages the employer in his inadequate remuneration of his employees, but it incites it. Everywhere the universal cry is, "Give us something cheap, cheap, cheap, cheap!" and the heads of the large factories and stores are daily trying to meet this demand, and to meet it the salaries of employees must be cut down. By the laws of social economics, some people must be figuratively shoved to the wall. It is not the head of the great dry-goods emporium who, as a rule, has to suffer. Oh no. He will get his percentage of profit, no matter what comes. But it is the mechanic at the bench. It is the poor female clerk, who receives a salary less than she can live on. It is the poor sewing-girl, who has to work all day and far into the hours of the night. It is not, as a rule, the capitalist who has to be crushed and squeezed by the great crowds which swarm around the "bargain counters" on a Monday morning. It is the small wage-earner, whose heart and life are being trampled under the feet of men and women who are scouring the stores to find goods which they can purchase at little above, or even less than cost. It is the poor girl and the young man who, on account of the awful struggle for a livelihood, which is daily becoming harder, are throwing themselves into the outstretched arms of temptation, and who are becoming more and more reconciled to lift their thin, pale lips for the polluted, poisonous, cancerous kiss of sin.

The grinding and satanic effects of sinful depreciation in the business world are the cause of many a tragedy. Look at that funeral! Who was that poor creature whose body is being taken to Potter's field? Yes, tumble her into a pine box, and shovel her under the ground! Who cares? She is nothing but a poor working-girl. Yes, nothing but a poor working girl, yet her life was just as dear to her as yours is to you. She had an invalid mother and a little baby brother. At night, when she would come home from the store, she would sometimes bring a few faded flowers and put them in an old, broken pitcher, and say, "Come, mother, let's play we were out in the country. How I wish we could see the old farm, where papa used to take us before he died. Tired? O yes; a little. The store is so hot, and the customers, especially about Christmas, find so much fault with us, as though we were not human. But then, I think of you and the baby, and the scoldings of the floor-walker do not cut so deep. There, mother, kiss me good-night. You know I must be up early in the morning to be down to the store on time."

Day after day she got weaker and weaker. The hours were long. The boxes were heavy to lift. Ah, she was earning bread. She was earning it with her life's blood. After awhile, two little red spots appeared in her thin, pale cheeks. Her eyes had an unnatural brilliancy. Half the night she would toss and toss, unable to sleep. The hacking cough never seemed to relieve the awful pain in the aching chest. One day "Number 37" fainted. When she was being carried to the cloak-room, an old lady customer stopped and looked and wiped her eyes and said, "Poor little thing. I wonder if my little grandchild will ever have to work like that?" Two of her companions took her home. After that she could not do much. Still, a happy smile would always welcome the girls who would stop at night after they left the store, and bring her an orange, or an apple, bought out of their scanty earnings. That is all. She's dead now. Tumble her into her pine box. Shovel her under the ground. She is nothing but a poor working-girl. What is the matter? Oh nothing, except that this continual depreciation of the price of goods has inevitably driven some people to the wall, and she is one of the first to go. What is the matter? Oh nothing, except the fact that thousands of men and women, some of whom are members of the church, are driving prices down and down, until at last a groan of agony is coming from the throats of hundreds of thousands of working-girls, whose moral and physical life is being crushed out of them. If an article is worth $10.00, pay it or go without. It is far better to pay young men or women a living salary to support them and save them from the fearful pressure of temptation, before they do wrong, than to establish rescue homes to save them after they have gone astray.

Depreciation, when it is unjust, is hypocrisy, and it is in a large measure responsible for the depressed conditions of spiritual life in the church, as well as in the home, and the store. Some people seem to think that the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ has nothing to do with the week day. They act as if they had a right to leave their piety at home on a Monday morning, as they would put on or off their Sunday clothes. But I want to tell you that Christ's teachings are utterly at variance with such hypocritical nonsense. If a man is not a Christian during the week day, he is not a Christian on Sunday. If a woman is not a Christian in her dealings with her groceryman, and butcher, her baker, and servant girl, and on her shopping expeditions, she is not a Christian when she goes to church. A falsehood is just as big and black when uttered over a store counter, as when it is told in church. It is as heinous an offence as was that lie told under the shadow of the uplifted hand which the Apostle Peter raised, when he was preaching to Ananias and Sapphira, near the Jerusalem temple. And so, my brother, if you want to consecrate your churches to God, you must also consecrate your stores and factories, your advertising columns, your commercial buyers, your clerks' salaries, and your draymen's wages. When some one asked George Whitefield whether a certain man was a Christian or no, the great Evangelist answered, "How can I tell? I never lived with him." So God will never declare we are his children, unless we resolve, like John Wesley, that during the Monday, and Tuesday, and Wednesday, and Thursday, and Friday, and Saturday, as well as the Sunday, we will try "to do all the good we can, to as many people as we can; as long as we can."

Beginning our sermon with a text, selected from the Book of Proverbs, we would end with a Spirit inspired, pleading peroration from the Book of Ecclesiastes. The two indirectly teach practically the same great lesson of our duty toward our fellowmen, "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter: 'Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.' Are we one and all ready to obey this inspired injunction? Are we ready to consecrate to the Master's service our dealings with human beings, as well as our direct dealings with Christ? Are we ready to consecrate our whole lives to Christ, not to-morrow, or next week, or next month, but now—just now? Brother, sister, do you know of any better moment to promise to live for Jesus than this moment, which is now ready to fly away?"

His Eyes Burned Out by Moorish Rebels

TANGIER, Morocco, Nov. 3, 1902.

NO doubt you have heard of the disturbed condition of Morocco at this time. Since the shooting of Mr. Cooper, the missionary at Fez (whose murderer was taken from the Mauli Edrees mosque and put to death), outside tribes, and that shooting is going on. In some of these cities there are missionaries at work; but we have heard of no loss of life thus far.

I send a photograph of the son of the Governor of Tangier, and the Secretary of the Governor. The Governor of Fez and the surrounding district, went out with a party to the Fahs Kabyle tribe to collect taxes. They pitched their tents, then sent out word to the people to come and pay their taxes. The people came, not to pay taxes but to do harm. They especially hated the Chief Secretary, and while the Governor escaped, they caught the Secretary, and bound him hand and foot. He begged for his life, and said he would give the tribe $2,000 if they would let him return with the Governor; but this they refused. They took off his clothing, and tied him to four stakes on the ground by the hands and feet. Then they whipped him until his flesh was bruised and bleeding. They placed a crown of thorns on his head and held a mock trial. The children of the tribe were told to throw dirt and spit on the Secretary. It was raining hard, and for two nights he was left outside, tied to a tree, without clothing, and the rain pouring heavily. For three days he had nothing to eat, nor did he sleep. Then they killed some sheep and oxen, and had a feast, and held the food near him, but never gave him a morsel to satisfy his hunger. At the close of the feast, they tied him to the ground again. After he was securely tied, they brought several long needles, heated red hot, and with these they burned out his eyes. Continue to pray for us, these are perilous times in this land.

many tribes have risen up in revolt. They want to kill or depose the present Sultan. All sorts of rumors reach us here at Tangier. We have no telegraph in Morocco over which we can receive inland news. We hear that a number of the cities have been surrounded by the

In no way have Western civilization and intercourse made a greater impression than in the introduction of active games for girls, such as tennis, basket-ball and croquet. A prettier sight cannot be imagined than the graceful fitting to and fro of these merry students, whose joyous laughter resounds on all sides. The Kindergarten department is large and sunny, and here little boys of rank were seen seated by sisters or cousins. Cordial greetings were extended by the superintendents of different departments, and eager questions were met by satisfactory responses and explanations, while specimens of drawing, painting and sewing were displayed with pride. No one takes such deep interest in the institution as the Empress, who personally visits and examines the classes with the greatest regularity. Originally intended for noblemen's daughters only, its benefits are now extended beyond such rigid lines.

The Joshi Dai Gakko, or University for Girls, in Tokio, and the Girls' High School in Yokohama are notable institutions. Of these, as of the Empress' School, it has been said: "No one doubts that they are the outgrowth of long-continued mission work in the direction of woman's education." The imperial school, which outranks the other two in priority, is seventeen years old. Thirty years ago in Yokohama, the Woman's Union Missionary Society opened a day and boarding school for girls, the very first organization for this object in Japan!

The Empress will greatly enlarge the scope of her own school, and the Government has fine schemes for woman's intellectual advancement.

A feature of the Mission School is the Dosokwai, an annual reunion of graduates, who come from all parts of the empire, bringing their children. The Empress, it is said, once received instruction from Mrs. True, an American and a missionary.

A GROUP OF OUR READERS' PROTEGEES IN INDIA

SEVEN bright, intelligent faces! Whose portraits are they? They are photographs of seven orphan children in India, whose board, clothing and education are being paid for by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Above each portrait is the name of the child and of the person who has generously undertaken its support.

Three of the portraits are sent by missionaries of the Irish Presbyterian Mission at Broach, Anand and Borsad, in the Bombay Presidency: Rev. Hamilton Martin, Rev. J. Shillidy and Miss M. Steen. These missionaries have an aggregate of six hundred and eighty children in their orphanages, of whom two hundred and seventy-six are supported by readers of this journal. They have assumed, with very good reason, that the Christian people who are providing for the children, would like to know something about their proteges, and accordingly have issued a pamphlet containing information as to the methods of management, which are excellent, and of the course of study, which is well adapted to the development of the children's minds and to enabling them to become self-supporting.

The pamphlet contains, also, a letter in the native language, which must be very gratifying to the patrons who have proteges in their institutions. It is signed by six of the older children on behalf of the others, and is a grateful and pathetic expression of their sense of obligation to the unknown benefactors, to whom they owe their lives and their prospects in the future. Following is a translation of part of the letter:

We have been informed that kind friends in America have sent money for our support, and that from it we are supplied with food, clothes, etc. For all this we thank God most heartily. We know that you have done all this because you are the servants of the Lord Jesus, and your hands have undertaken these merciful and benevolent works for his glory.

We belong to many different villages of Gujarat, but we now live in Borsad under the care of the Padri Saheb [the missionary]. Besides learning to read and write, some of us are learning trades with the older orphans. Some are going to be suthars [carpenters], others darjis [tailors], others kherduts [farmers], others mochis [shoemakers], others dhobies [washermen], and others are learning to weave. We are all quite happy.

We are very grateful to you for your kindness to us, and we pray that our Heavenly Father may abundantly bless you. May the Lord reward you for all you are doing on our behalf.

We hope to do work for the Lord some day. Pray for us that we may become true servants of the Lord Jesus and that we may act as becometh his faithful followers.

Signed for ourselves and on behalf of the others,

PRAG TISA. NANI JIVA.
YAKUB ASHA. KHANI MITHA.
DHANA JETHA. GANGA VALA.

It is also gratifying to note in this pamphlet an acknowledgment of the services rendered by our readers during the famine. The missionaries say that no one gave more effective service in that time of awful distress, and that "the money and the corn sent were the means of saving thousands of lives."

For the benefit of the large number of new readers who have joined THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family during the past few weeks, we may say that there are many orphans whose maintenance by the missionaries is becoming a very serious problem, and may become a hopeless one if no one is willing to take up the burden. It costs fifteen dollars a year to support and educate an orphan in India. Any one desiring to engage in this Christlike work may send the money to us, and we will put him in communication with a missionary in India of any denomination he may indicate, who will assign an orphan, and report to him regularly and directly as to that orphan's condition and progress.

TRAINED BATTALIONS FOR CHRISTIAN SERVICE

By H. W. POPE
Secretary of the Northfield Extension

A RECENT visit to the Moody Institute of Chicago, has impressed me anew with the far-sightedness of its famous founder. Mr. Moody early recognized that a large part of our religious work must eventually be done by lay workers. He also saw that there were hundreds of young men and women in the churches who, with a year or two of special training in the Bible, might fill acceptably many positions of usefulness.

The course is two years, and includes a thorough study of the English Bible and how to use it, music and how to conduct it, and methods of personal work. Not only are the students expected to spend a certain number of hours each day at lectures and in study, but they also have assignments in religious work in jails, missions and other institutions. Each student is required to report on his religious work, to describe before the class what he or she has done, the methods employed, the Scripture used, and the apparent results.

At such a meeting recently, when the instructor asked those students who had spoken to some one about their soul during the past week to rise, out of a hundred and fifty present all but half a dozen rose. When those who thought that by God's help they had actually led a soul to Christ during the week were asked to stand, fully half of the class arose. A notable English preacher who was present, said to the instructor afterwards:

"When you asked the class those questions you nearly took my breath away, and when I saw the response, I was amazed and thankful to God for such an Institution as this! I am sure if such questions were put to our Cambridge students, they would be astounded."

The churches are constantly calling for competent lay men and women, who can organize and train workers and teach them to use the Bible in personal work. There is a demand for competent Bible teachers, who believe in the Bible, and know how to make it speak for itself.

In addition to the usual routine work of the Institute, I found that the American Sunday School Union was holding its tenth annual conference for the Central, Northwest, Southwest, and Rocky Mountain districts at the Institute. One hundred and twenty-four missionaries were present, from twenty-three States and territories. The Institute can easily lodge, feed, and care for them, while at the same time all its exercises go on without interruption. Prominent leaders like Rev. Addison P. Foster, D.D., of Boston; F. G. Ensign, of Chicago; W. A. Hillis, of Cleveland; E. B. Stevenson, of St. Louis Mo., and others, gave strong addresses during the week, while the missionaries themselves made the audience laugh and cry by turns, as they described their work on the frontiers. These experiences were very helpful to the students.

Besides this, the Institute Extension was holding two downtown meetings daily at McVicker's Theatre, addressed by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. The object of these services was to reach business men at the noon hour. The Institute can furnish singers, and at the same time scatter two hundred or more trained workers throughout an audience.

Aside from the noon meetings in the heart of the city, the Institute was also carrying on several series of evangelistic services in different parts of the city, led by Rev. David V. Gwilyn, D.D., of New York; Rev. H. W. Pope, of the Northfield Extension; Rev. N. Fay Smith, of Northfield, and others. Similar services have also been held recently at Le Mars and Cedar Rapids, Ia., while Bible institutes have been conducted in Toledo, Dayton and Lorain, O., Milwaukee, Wis., Aurora, Ill., and Salem, Va., conducted by Dr. James M. Gray, of Boston, Mass.; President A. P. Fitt, of the Institute, and Rev. H. W. Pope, of New Haven, Conn.

Mr. John H. Hunter, the assistant superintendent of the Institute, is conducting a popular weekly evening Bible Class in Milwaukee, Wis., and three other classes in Chicago. The success of these popular Bible classes shows that the Word of God has lost none of its old-time power.

Rev. R. A. Torrey, Superintendent of this Institution, who has been winning thousands to Christ in Australasia, has recently arrived in India, while Rev. E. A. Marshall, another Institute Bible lecturer, has reached China in a missionary tour around the world.

I see Mr. Moody's aims and methods in all the life and work of the Institute, and rejoice that that great and good man is repeating himself in the hundreds of earnest, effective young men and women who are annually leaving this Institution and joining the ranks of the soldiers of Christ in active service at home and abroad.

TENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF MISSIONARIES AND FRIENDS OF THE A.S.S.U., MOODY INSTITUTE, CHICAGO

MRS. JOHN BIDWELL shook out a wet pillow-case and pinned it to her immaculate clothes-line with a firm pucker of her handsome mouth. "Now if Mother Bidwell 'll only keep out of mischief till I get these clo'es hung—but I don't s'pose she will," was the thought that darkened the keen gray eyes. The towels, snapped out with comprehensive energy, soon fluttered in a long, uneasy row; the shirts came next, pink, blue and purple; they made a bright blotch of color against the faint, discouraged green of the grass, newly emerged from winter quarters and seemingly mindful of certain stubborn and grimy drifts yet lingering in fence corners and along the shady side of the lilac bushes.

"Why, I do d'clare, Mis' Bidwell, if you ain't smart!" cried a nasally plaintive voice from the front gate. "Starch clo'es an' all—outa'ready! Our folks ain't fairly to sudsin' yit; I tell 'em it ain't as it used to be when I was able to take a holt."

Mrs. Bidwell, having pinned up the last piece in her basket, turned with an air of hardly concealed pride. "Good mornin', Mis' Thomson," she said, with a toss of her sunbonneted head. "Land, I thought I'd be behind ev'rybody with my wash to-day! I'm reely ashamed of myself, but I've been hendered in my work consid'able lately."

"John's mother's with you now, ain't she?" queried the other. "I heerd she wasn't quite right in her mind sence the ol' gent'man died."

"She was pretty well upset by it," Mrs. Bidwell admitted. "An' she had a heavy spell of sickness just after the fun'ral."

"What has John done with the prop'ty?" pursued her inquisitor, blinking curiously at the close-shuttered front of the comfortable two-story house. "Mirandy, she thought mebbe you'd be goin' there to live; it's a sightly place."

"Land, no!" cried Mrs. Bidwell; "John couldn't leave his business nohow, an' I wouldn't think of livin' on a farm. The place is rented just as it stood."

"What, furnitur' an' all?" ejaculated the other, lifting her hands. "My, I sh'd think the ol' lady 'ud hated to leave her han'some rag carpets, an' her house-plants an' ev'rythin'!"

"We ain't lackin' for carpets 'at I know of," said Mrs. Bidwell stiffly. "I guess I'll have to be goin' in now. Come an' see us some day, Mis' Thomson."

A decisive shutting of the back door, a clashing of stove-lids and poker in active co-operation, accompanied by the brisk tapping of broad boot-heels on the uncarpeted floor, announced her entrance to the only other occupant of the house, who was dozing in a big rocking-chair drawn close to the base-burner. This person responded to the breath of vigor and activity, which seemed to invade the quiet house like a blast of March wind, by starting to her feet. "It's Luelly," she whispered to herself; "she's got her clo'es all out! My, she's a smart woman—is my son John's wife, Luelly! John done well to git her. Father thinks so too."

She was a tiny creature, on whom the weight of years and grief lay heavily, tiny and bent and withered, yet withal exhalng a delicate aura of love and goodness and peace, which one could perceive plainly enough if one but waited in the gentle presence.

"I'm glad to find you so quiet, mother," said her daughter-in-law tentatively, as she bustled into the room. She looked keenly about as she spoke, her eyes coming to a decisive standstill on something seen through the open door of the adjoining bedroom. "Dear, dear!" she said sharply. "I do believe I'll have to put your things under lock an' key. Why can't you 'tend to your knitting, an' leave the place in order?"

The old lady stretched out tremulous, imploring hands, as Mrs. Bidwell gathered up a pile of neatly folded clothing from the bed, and began to store it away.

"I've had a reel nice visit with you an' John, Luelly," she faltered; "but I jes' couldn't think of stayin' away from home another day. Father, he can't get along without me; an' there's my house-cleanin' to 'tend to, an' my g'raniums—the white one with the narrer pink edges was jest a-comin' into blow as I come away. So thinks I, I'd better be gettin' my things picked up this mornin' whilst you was busy with the wash. I don't want to put you out, Luelly, any more'n I can help, but father 'll be after me to-day."

"Now, Mother Bidwell," said the younger woman firmly, "I want you should set right down in your chair an' listen to me. I've told you over an' over how 'tis; but I'm goin' to tell you once more, an' see if you can't stop bein' so foolish. Father's dead! Don't you remember? You was at the fun'ral, an' set right by the coffin."

"Oh, yes, Luelly, I remember the fun'ral well 'nough; but that wasn't my John's fun'ral; 'twas his father; your John's grandfather, child. Why, I saw father only yeste'day a-passin' the window. I put on my bunnet to go after him; but you take sech dretful good care of me, Luelly, 'at you was afraid I'd ketch cold, an' you wouldn't let me go. I can't think why he didn't stop. But he'll be here to-day, father will; an' I'll have to be goin' home. Not that I ain't enjoyed my visit, daughter; I have. As I says to father, John's wife is the smartest housekeeper I ever see,

Meanwhile the younger Mrs. Bidwell was setting her flat-irons over to heat, with an impatient frown at the truthful clock. "It's a sheer waste of time to argue with mother," she said to herself. "If I didn't have the patience of Job, I could never get along with her in the world. I do believe I've put away her clo'es forty times, if I have once, since she's been here. But John Bidwell can't complain that I haven't done my duty by his mother; that's one thing certain!"

Two hours later she was standing over the small figure in the rocking-chair. "I've brought your dinner right in here, mother," she said kindly. "The kitchen's draughty to-day, an' John's in a hurry. Here's your tea, all sweetened, an' a piece of toast an' some mashed potatoes. Now set right up an' eat. I thought you wouldn't care for any meat this noon; we've got sparerib, an' pork ain't good for your stomach." She bustled away, pausing at the door to add authoritatively,

"Don't you try to bring out the dishes; you'd be sure to drop some of 'em an' break 'em, as you did last week. I'll come an' get 'em after awhile. Now remember!"

Old Mrs. Bidwell looked at the neat tray through two of the painful tears. "Land, ain't I onreasonable! and Luelly takin' sech trouble for me all the while. I do hate to be a burden, I do reely."

She tasted the lukewarm tea and patiently broke the hard toast into bits. "John takes sugar in his tea," she murmured, "an' so Luelly always puts it in mine. But as I tell father, sweetened tea tastes jes' like med'cine to me. I like it hot, too—good an' hot. I always let my teapot come to a good bile; but Luelly, she says that spoils the tea. She says it ain't good for me that way. Well, when I get home I guess father an' me'll have things our own way. Seems 's'o I couldn't hardly wait—if I could jes' go right along an' s'prise father! He'd be glad enough to see me, I know."

When Mrs. Bidwell came after the tray, she found her husband's mother knitting very fast, her dim eyes fixed on the bit of dull street visible from the rocking-chair. "Why, you ain't e't hardly any of your dinner, mother," she exclaimed, in a displeased tone, "an' I a-takin' so much pains with your toast, too."

"I wa'n't reely hungry to-day, Luelly," said the old woman, with a faint apologetic smile. "A-settin' here so constant, kind of—"

"Land! I don't know what more you c'n ask," broke in the other impatiently. "A good warm fire, a nice comf'table chair to set in, an' nothin' under the sun to worrit you from mornin' till night. I sh'd think you'd be perfectly contented. I know I should if I was in your place."

"Well, so I be, Luelly, so I be. An' when you come to my house to visit, I'll know jest what you like; you kin set in a chair all day by the stove an' knit. I've got a settin'-room to my house, Luelly, an' a rockin'-chair an' a stove!" A pink spot had appeared on either faded cheek. After a pause, she added:

"I was a-thinkin' that mebbe I'd lay down on the bed in my room for a spell an' kin' of rest my back—if there ain't anythin' I kin do to help."

"Well, I mus' say, that's the sensiblest thing I've heard you say in a long while," said Mrs. Bidwell, approvingly. "A nap 'll do you good; come right in and lay down, an' I'll cover you up nice an' warm."

"I b'lieve mother's beginnin' to fail reel fast," she cogitated with a dutiful sigh, as she tested her irons with a skilful finger. Presently, she began to hum pleasantly to herself a hymn which had been sung in church the day before: "Lead, Kindly Light, amid th' encircling gloom; lead Thou me on!"—as she ironed and folded John's pink and blue shirts.

Mother Bidwell lay quietly on her bed, in the small, dark bedroom, her blue eyes closed, her thin lips moving. The cheerful click of the flat-irons, and the winding melody of the tune came dully to her old ears. But faint and far as was the melody, the hymn was writ deep in that sorrowful heart. "Lead Thou me on!" The words rose to her lips, a sobbing prayer. "Oh, Lord, I want to see father so bad! I'm so dretful homesick!"

She was sitting up now, the gray head bowed upon her knees. "The night is dark and I am far from home; lead Thou me on!" The words, long-drawn and plaintive, reached her

I says. But the best of frien's must part some time, so I guess—"

"Well, you c'n wait till he gets here before you pack up," said Mrs. Bidwell, with a resigned sigh. "There'll be plenty of time, I guess. Now you jus' set down awhile with your knitting an' rest."

"Couldn't I help you a little, Luelly, to pass away the time?" asked the old woman, timidly. "I'd reely enjoy rubbin' off some of the plain pieces."

"Not this morning, mother. Your eyesight's too poor to iron," returned her daughter-in-law crisply. "The last time I let you try it you scorched two of my best hand-towels. Here's your knitting; now set right down here by the stove an' keep warm. I don't want you should ketch cold an' get sick on my han's again, an' me so busy."

The old lady sank meekly into her chair, but she furtively wiped away two or three of the slow, painful tears of age on the half-finished sock.

The "Old-Time Religion"

WE believe that very general interest will be felt in the review of the great revivals of the last century, which appears elsewhere in this issue. In these later days, when the old Gospel is attacked from every side, and when the very pillars of the old-time religion would seem to be shaken, it is reassuring to look back at the triumphs which that Gospel has won in this world of sinners. There are to-day more godly men and women in the world than ever, who have experienced the converting power of Christ, and who are living the spiritual life. To them, the faith that bore their parents triumphant through the "valley of the shadow" is a grand and beautiful reality—the most real of all things. It opens to them the full joy of life, and makes it worth living.

It is beyond question that, in many respects, we have made material advances over the Gospel methods of the last century. We now recognize, much more than in earlier years, the need of training for those who undertake the work of religious instruction. Without any sacrifice of spirituality, we are more systematic and practical in our religious work. One may be "spirit-filled," and yet unable to lead others into the light; and there are dangers attendant upon ignorant and inexperienced teaching, however honest and sincere. Moreover, the day of religious frenzy is passing away. Bodily paroxysms are no longer attributed to spiritual agency; we no longer address ourselves exclusively to the emotions; meetings are not now protracted to the limit of human endurance; converts humbly seek instruction, rather than to instruct, and the layman is subordinated to the authority of the experienced pastor.

That those early evangelists were genuinely consecrated, that they were sincere in spending their lives for Christ, and that the "passion for souls" which animated them was a high and holy passion, is undeniable. Theirs was the triumph of spiritual sacrifice. They lived, not for themselves, but for others. They held the world's riches and honors and comforts as dross, and not to be compared with the joys of the Master's service. May they never be forgotten, and may the chain of influences, the links of which they forged with their own lives, go on widening and lengthening throughout the generations!

The Shadow of a Great Evil

WITHIN a few months, the assertion has been openly made, and widely repeated in press and pulpit, that American women are becoming more and more addicted to habits of intemperance. Bishop Coleman and other men of prominence in public affairs have charged that the drinking habit is spreading at an alarming rate in American homes. It has even been asserted by statisticians, that at the present rate of progress, another decade or two would find us, as a nation, so thoroughly alcoholized that the very springs and foundations of our home life would be poisoned and the physical and mental welfare of the coming generations placed in jeopardy. Those who have started the alarm have pointed us to France, whose dwindling population they regard as a result largely attributable to alcoholic indulgence.

Is this gloomy horoscope well founded, as far as the American people is concerned? Is the drink habit really becoming so formidable an evil as to threaten the homes of the nation? Are we in danger of becoming a race of degenerates through drink?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not believe in sounding a needless alarm, nor in exaggerating the situation. The charge so widely spread has not yet been proved here. On the other hand, in England, according to a writer in The Daily News, it is abundantly proved by the police court records, the returns of coroners' inquests, the Registrar-General's figures, and the general demand for more inebriate homes for women, that feminine drinking is dangerously increasing.

Some of the figures supplied by the wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury (a leader in the movement to counteract drunkenness) are sufficiently startling. Since 1878 the deaths of women from chronic alcoholism have increased over 145 per cent. In London alone 8,900 women have been arrested and committed as incurable drunkards, as against 4,300 men committed in the same period. Young women of the laboring and middle classes were the chief contributors to the increase.

In the United States the drinking habit is largely cultivated in secret, though it is undeniable that public drinking by women in hotels, restaurants, and the refreshment parlors of some department stores is also becoming a commonplace thing. Yet many of us can remember the time when no self-respecting American woman was to be seen drinking in public.

To ascertain what the facts in the case really are, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD addressed itself to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, as the one organization which should be able to speak with authority in reply to the very serious charges brought against the women of America. We print below letters on the subject from Mrs. Ella A. Boole, President of the New York State Society, and Helen M. Barker, of the Illinois organization, which merit careful consideration.

Editor of The Christian Herald:

Dear Sir—I have no positive evidence to substantiate the statement that intemperance among wives and mothers is increasing. I am of the opinion that total abstinence is increasing among the respectable middle classes, but that fashionable women drink more in public than formerly. The custom of flavoring food with wine, sherry and brandy seems to be increasing, and this is bound to create a liking for the drink itself. Then, these are strenuous days, and women as well as men live beyond their strength. The "social glass" so common in fashionable life, food flavored with liquor, and the secret use of alcoholics for home prescription, all contribute to the appetite for strong drink, and unless efforts are made to stop any and all of these things, drunkenness among women is bound to increase.

Another reason why it is difficult to gain the facts in regard to the results of drunkenness among women, is that it is generally a secret vice, concealed by the woman and her friends.

Drinking among the wealthy and in the slums does not seem to be decreasing, but the middle classes, who largely make up the working membership of our churches, are coming more and more to appreciate the value of total abstinence.

Fraternally yours, ELLA A. BOOLE.

Editor of The Christian Herald:

Dear Sir—Lady Henry Somerset, of England, in a speech at our recent convention at Portland, stated that there was a very great increase of drinking by women in England, and that they had, what we do not have, women going into saloons in large numbers with men to drink. And this, not as with us, confined to abandoned women, but women in comfortable circumstances, and otherwise respectable. All through England they have barmails, and this, of itself, would be an encouragement to women to visit saloons.

Up to this time we have been able to secure legislation to prevent the employment of women in saloons, and thus far, public sentiment is such, that, except by the lowest grade of women, saloons are not patronized by them.

Physicians tell us that society women are more and more using various nostrums, "headache cures," and all kinds of preparations, containing more or less of liquor, opium, cocaine, chloral, etc., etc., as tonics, stimulants, and that among the "400" much fashionable drinking is common. This is not new, but it is dangerous.

I am glad Bishop Coleman has called attention to this question, and this may set people to thinking in a way that will result in reform. To a thinking man or woman, the prospects are alarming, and every journal that goes into the home should sound a warning note.

Evanston, Ill.

It should be noted that the writers of these letters concur on two points, viz.: that drinking among what is known as "fashionable people," and also among the very lowest class, is increasing, while among the middle class and the church-going, respectable element, the temperance movement continues to make substantial headway. But a still more startling statement is that of May B. Goudey, of Lunenburg, Mass., a well-known temperance leader, who recently wrote:

I heard a public speaker, in whom I have great confidence, relate this truly appalling incident. He said that in a certain city in one of the Middle States (naming the city) an asylum had been opened for women inebriates, and that within ten days sixteen hundred applications had been received from husbands for their wives, and fathers for their daughters, until the asylum was filled to overflowing.

If even a fraction be true of what Bishop Coleman asserts or of what these letters admit—here is a problem which demands the immediate attention of every sober, pure-minded, patriotic man and woman in America. Let them bend all energies to the task of ascertaining the real facts, and then let the country know the full extent of the peril that threatens and how it may be averted.

A Sacred Masterpiece

The Red Letter Bible is not only a master-piece as to workmanship, but it is just what I need. My old Bible is worn out by constant reading and handling. May God's blessing follow the use of the new one as it followed the use of the old.

An Eight-Day Conference on Missions

HOW most effectually to awaken the missionary spirit, is a problem that every church has to consider. The denomination or the individual church that takes little or no interest in missions is on the way to decadence. Christianity is by its essence aggressive, not intolerant in these better times, but eager to spread the knowledge of the truth. To fulfil its mission, the church needs energy and zeal in advancing into unchristianized territory; it needs the spirit of self-sacrifice in its young preachers, leading them to volunteer for service in heathen lands; and it needs money to provide the means of sending laborers into the field and the cost of Bibles and religious literature. To achieve success in all three departments, it is necessary that the people should understand what has been already accomplished and what opportunities are now presented for extending the work. Above all, it is necessary that there should be united prayer, that the Holy Spirit may touch the hearts of the Lord's people, producing personal and pecuniary consecration.

New York has just witnessed a well-planned and finely-executed effort, on the part of one section of Christ's church, to attain these results. The Protestant Episcopal churches of the city have united in devoting a whole week to the consideration of the subject of missions. Beginning with November 30, on which day special missionary services were held in every Protestant Episcopal church in the city, the subject was brought before the people, day by day, in sermons, in addresses by eloquent speakers, in reports from the missionary fields, and in special prayers, until December 7, when again special missionary services were held in every church. Bishops from other dioceses came to help the New York Bishop and clergy in the good work.

Each day of the week there was a preaching service at noon at Trinity Church, and another at the same hour at St. Paul's. At 4 p.m., there were conferences at the Church of Zion and St. Timothy, at which the subjects discussed were: The Influence of Colleges in Carrying the Spirit of Christianity to Heathendom; Medical Missions; The Training of Missionaries; and Moral Questions in Missions. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, great mass meetings were held in Carnegie Hall, at which the subjects presented were: Christ and the Country; The Gospel for the Modern City; The World's Need; The Light of the World; What Missions Have Done; Missions the Life of Christianity; and The Sure Success. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings, missionary meetings were held simultaneously in churches in various parts of the city, Brooklyn and Staten Island, and meetings for children and of the Women's Auxiliary were held in the Y. M. C. A. Hall. A Missionary exhibit of trophies, idols, symbolic objects, etc., was held in the Parish House of the Church of Zion and St. Timothy, which attracted numerous visitors. It is worthy of notice that there were no collections at these public meetings. The managers believed that it was better that deliberate and well-considered offerings should come as the result of the information given, and were more desirable both for the Society and the givers than pledges made under the impulse produced by eloquent appeals.

The missionary work conducted by the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which was, of course, the work chiefly considered, embraces missions in South Dakota, Western Texas, Southern Florida, The Indian Territory, in Mexico, Hayti, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, in Western Africa, China and Japan. In all foreign lands, it labors in friendly co-operation with the parent Society, the famous Church Missionary Society of the Church of England, which was represented at the recent meetings by Dr. Arthur T. Lloyd, Bishop of Thetford, in the Diocese of Norwich. It was organized by the Convention of 1820, and reorganized under its present name in 1835. In the three foreign fields in which its success has been most notable, Western Africa, China and Japan, the work shows marked progress. A unique condition exists in the African station, in the fact that there is only one white missionary on the staff. The other thirty-five are Liberians and natives, who were all educated in the mission schools. There are over sixteen hundred communicants on the station and 2,932 children in the schools. The two centres of work in China are Shanghai and Hankow, over each of which a bishop presides. In Japan also there are two centres, Tokio and Kyoto, each with its bishop. One of the most active and zealous workers in the recent meetings was the last named bishop, Dr. Sidney C. Partridge, of Kyoto.

It is significant that the meetings should have taken place at the season of Advent. We may hope that they may prove the beginning of a new and still more vigorous era of missionary work at home and abroad.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Traveling in Thibet

THE return of the explorer Sven Hedin from Thibet, and his promised visit to this country, has directed public attention anew to that mysterious land. For years it has been the desire of travelers and the object of devoted missionaries to reach Lassa, the capital of Thibet. As yet no white man has ever succeeded in this object and the missionaries believe that the only way of spreading the news of the gospel in this hot-bed of Buddhism is by enlisting the interests of those in charge of the great caravans which every now and then go from China to Lassa, and to supply them with New Testaments and Christian literature. The Thibetans have few camels, as they are essentially mountaineers, using principally yak (the oxen of Asia) as beasts of burden and as saddle animals. A wooden ring is passed through the cartilage of the nose, and a string is attached to it by which the animal is guided and fastened to the ground at night. When this latter precaution is not taken, the natives have great difficulty in catching the yak when the time comes to break camp. It is only after more than one fruitless attempt that they will allow themselves to be caught by the horn. Their masters have to approach them carefully, and can only seize them by surprise. Loading them is an extremely difficult process. Sometimes an hour is spent in fastening the chests on their backs. As soon as the beast is caught it has to be fettered, and even then the loading has to be done in spite of heels and horns. The Thibetans never beat these animals. Under the circumstances, they are quick over their work. They handle great loads with considerable ease. The Lamas, stick in hand, stand over their inferiors, give them orders and reprimand them. But the savages do their work cheerfully; they respond quickly to any commands at the lamas' rebukes they listen respectfully, assuming a humble posture, with backs bent and lolling tongue. The Thibetans are shrewd and enterprising traders, and are able to hold their own even with the Chinese, to whom they sell large quantities of lamb-skins, wool, yak-hides, musk, fur (principally lynx and fox-skins), rhubarb and deer horns. The traders go well armed, as the caravans are in constant danger of being attacked. It is grievous that they should so obstinately oppose the entrance of the missionary, whose work would do so much for the bodies as well as the souls of the people. We can but hope that the copies of the Word of God already sent over the border may eventually work a change in their policy.

The entrance of thy Word giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple (Ps. 119: 130).

The President's Message

The country had been prepared, to some extent, for the character of President Roosevelt's message, by the speeches he delivered during his recent tour. It was to be expected that the tariff and the trusts would occupy a prominent place, and the expectation was realized. Mr. Roosevelt believes, with respect to the former, that the burdens now unnecessarily imposed might be relieved, with less danger to our commercial interests, if reductions were made by means of reciprocity treaties. We would then, at least, gain some advantage in return for the duties we surrender. It is obvious that this method would tend to the extension of our export trade. When, however, reciprocity will not afford relief, or cannot be arranged, the President recommends direct legislation, which should not be enacted without careful inquiry. With respect to the trusts, the President urges prompt and vigorous action. It is, he believes, impossible to control them through the State Legislatures and it must therefore be done by national action. He says: "We are not hostile to the trusts; we are merely determined that they shall be so handled as to subserve the public good. We draw the line against misconduct, not against wealth. Publicity can do no harm to the honest corporation, and we need not be over-tender about sparing the dishonest corporation." He contends that the evil of fraudulent over-capitalization and unjust discrimination affect inter-state commerce, and so legitimately come under the province of Congress. If it should be found that Congress has not the requisite power, a constitutional amendment should be passed to give such power. The same principle, the President would apply to the Trades Unions. He expresses a belief in their usefulness, but thinks that there is evil in them which should be eliminated. The President, as was foreseen, makes an appeal on behalf of Cuba, and promises to submit at an early date a reciprocity treaty, which, if endorsed by the Senate, will give the afflicted island some measure of relief. Very timely, and, alas, very necessary, was the solemn warning the President administered to the members of both branches of Congress against negligence of duty as well as against unwise legislation. He said: "The events of the last four years have definitely decided that, for woe or for weal, our place must be great among the nations. We may either fail greatly or succeed greatly; but we cannot avoid the endeavor from which either great failure or great success must come. Even if we would, we cannot play a small part. If we should try, all that would follow would be that we should play a large part ignobly and shamefully." The President is right. Our greatness imposes responsibility. Never before was a nation in so favorable a position for exerting an influence for righteousness, over Christian and heathen peoples. It was well, therefore, that the President should remind its leaders of the effect of our national example, as did that ruler, more than two thousand years ago, when he addressed that career will not encourage them to brave other risks for the same end. There are some dangers in the pursuit of wealth that no person can afford to despise.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in perdition (1. Timothy 6: 9).

Crazed by Prosperity

A millionaire business man in New York was formally committed a few days ago to the Manhattan State Hospital as a person of unsound mind, and his wife was appointed committee of his person. The affliction was a great shock to his friends, of whom he had many. His rise to wealth was phenomenal. Less than twenty years ago he was a paper-hanger working for daily wages in Chicago. By the assistance of friends he was enabled to open a small decorator's shop, and not having enough capital to keep a stock of wall-paper, sold it from samples supplied to him by wholesale houses. He had excellent taste in that department of his business, and seemed to know by instinct the patterns that would please the public. His customers multiplied, and he opened branch establishments in Boston, Philadelphia and New York. In each city he did a large business and accumulated an immense fortune. He kept a fine yacht, bought the best kind of automobiles and had many valuable horses. Recently he purchased a magnificent house and grounds. His business continued to grow and his devotion to it did not abate. He worked harder than ever. A few weeks ago he showed signs of collapse. His friends noticed that he acted strangely, and ultimately it became necessary to place him under restraint. The specialists say that the sole cause of his mind being unbalanced was his phenomenal business success. How many there are who, in spite of such warnings, give themselves with similar intensity to their business interests. It is a pity that they are not so earnest in the pursuit of heavenly riches, for in that pursuit there is neither danger nor disappointment.

The blessing of the Lord maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it (Prov. 10: 22).

BRIEF NOTES

Renewing subscribers will confer a great favor on the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD if, when renewing, they state that their subscription is a RENEWAL, or attach, if convenient, the yellow date tab to their letter.

A Virginian legislator has introduced a bill curtailing the kissing habit. It provides penalties in the case of a person suffering from pulmonary disease kissing a healthy person.

Application has been made to the Circuit Court in Kentucky by a Roman Catholic clergyman, to forbid the reading of the Bible in the public schools. The application was rejected.

The General Synod of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Canada has passed an ordinance forbidding its clergy to perform a marriage ceremony between a man and his deceased wife's sister.

We are asked to state that any church desiring a supply, or assistance in Evangelistic work, may hear of such help at reasonable terms by addressing Rev. A. S. Copley, 600 South Pine Street, Lima, O.

Of the 480 institutions included in the list of American colleges and universities by the United States Commissioner of Education, 360 are set down as founded or controlled by some branch of the Christian Church.

The official records of Shawnee County, Kansas, show that the divorces applied for are nearly one-half the number of marriages. Last year there were 561 marriages in the county and 234 applications for divorce.

The Woman's Union Missionary Society has sent out recently three missionaries of great promise, to labor respectively in India, China and Japan. Miss Ella Butcher, a graduate of Johns Hopkins, goes to Jhansi, in Central India; Dr. Burnham, from Minette New England College, Boston, is on her way to China; and Miss Susie M. Pratt to Yokohama, Japan, where she will conduct a Bible School for the training of Japanese women as Bible readers.

"A Bringer of Good Tidings"

I am delighted with The Story of the Hall of Fame, and take pleasure in showing it to my friends, hoping its bright, attractive dress and well-filled pages, rich in ennobling thought and inspiration, may induce many of them to join our CHRISTIAN HERALD family. I wait the paper's prompt weekly visit with interest; it comes as a messenger of good tidings, a bringer of good things. It never disappointed me.

Married Among Lions

An extraordinary wedding ceremony took place in New York last week. The proprietor of a menagerie now on exhibition in the city, conceived the idea of attracting a large number of visitors by having a wedding celebrated in the lions' den. Only one way could be pursued to achieve his desire, and that was to offer a reward to any couple who would take the chief parts in the ceremony. He therefore announced that five hundred dollars would be paid to the pair. The offer reached the ears of a young Dane, who had been engaged to a Danish girl in Denmark, and had come to this country in the hope of getting enough money to marry and begin housekeeping. They had been disappointed, and were therefore glad to avail themselves of the showman's offer. A minister willing to perform the ceremony was not easy to find, but eventually one consented. The five Numidian lions in the show were driven into one pen, and when they were disposed in a semicircle in the cage, the clergyman and the bridal party entered. The keeper of the lions, with a long steel fork in one hand and a revolver in the other, followed and took a place from which he could observe the conduct of the beasts. There was no interruption of the service, save an occasional roar from one or other of the lions; but every member of the party appeared to be relieved when the knot was tied, and the strong bars were again between them and the lions. The young couple must have wanted the money very badly, to have run so great a risk to obtain it. We may hope that their escape at the outset of their matrimonial

GREAT REVIVAL

IS the old-time religion dying out? Has the day of the revival waxed and waned, and is it becoming a thing of the past? Is the religion of Jesus Christ losing its power over the hearts of men? These are questions that arise with increasing frequency in every community. They are all the more pertinent at the present time, when God's people have long been praying and hoping for a revival, when church attendance is declining, and when the religious apathy of the nation sorely needs an awakening.

Revivals, in the modern sense, had their birth in the beginning of the last century. It is a singular coincidence that, with a new century lately begun, many of the conditions resemble those that existed a hundred years ago. Those old-time revivals, now so seldom recalled, are full of interest to the student of religious progress, and carry a helpful lesson to Christians today. Their varied and peculiar manifestations; their strange and often sudden beginnings; their swift spread as, with vast leaps, they swept from State to State; their weird and terrifying manifestations of spiritual power, utterly incomprehensible to human understanding; the ecstasies, the prostrations and exaltations that marked many gatherings, when sinners were convicted of sin and "slain by thousands," as the older evangelists have told us—these and many other scenes and occurrences must still impress us with the conviction that and that the methods of the Holy Spirit in dealing with the sinner are divinely varied to meet the widest range of human wickedness and human necessity.

God moves in a mysterious way,

The Century's First Revival

There is probably no period in the history of Christianity in America so full of picturesque incident as that which is known as "The Great Revival" of 1799-1803, with which the birth of the American camp-meeting will always be associated. Five men, till then practically unknown, were divinely chosen as the instruments in this memorable movement. They were the Revs. William McGee, James Greedy and James Hodge, Presbyterians, and the Revs. John McGee and William Burke, Methodists. The McGees, who were brothers, though of different denominations, had been invited, together with several other preachers, to assist in a sacramental service at a little settlement on the banks of the Red River, Kentucky. John McGee, the elder of the brothers, made the opening address and was followed by William McGee and Mr. Hodge. There was a copious outpouring of the Spirit and many in the audience were melted to tears. Sobs, cries and increasing fervor marked the rest of the services. Three of the assisting pastors left the house, unable to bear the strain of the excitement, but the McGees remained. People living nearby heard of the wonderful doings and came in large numbers to the meeting-house, which soon overflowed. Then, at the suggestion of the preachers, the crowds adjourned to the forest, and there, under the trees, set up an altar, and continued the services, the people meanwhile living in tents and bringing their food in wagons, many from long distances. All worshiped together in the utmost harmony—Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists—and the manifestations of the Spirit's power were repeated from day to day at every meeting. Immense throngs came from near and far and the conversions multiplied daily.

From this pioneer gathering—the first American camp meeting—others sprang up in the same section. One was held at Muddy River, one at Gospel River, and another at a place called "The Ridge." Hundreds were swept into the Kingdom as if by a spiritual cyclone. It was estimated that at some of these gatherings (in 1799-1800) there were as many as 20,000 persons in attendance, representing many different Protestant denominations. At some of the meetings scores fell down as dead, "slain of the Spirit," and lay unconscious for longer or shorter periods. At Cobbin, Ky., 20,000 attended, and thousands were reported as prostrated. At Desher's Creek "the people fell like corn before the wind." Revs. Wm. McKendry and Wm. Burke (Methodists) were among the most indefatigable workers. Among the converts were men who had been deists, atheists, drunkards, profane, sceptics, Sabbath-breakers, and gamblers. All were alike overpowered by the wondrous wave of conviction and awakening. It was a spiritual Niagara. Families were reunited, old feuds healed and churches built up.

But the revival was not confined to a few localities in the West. It spread till it swept across the Cumberland and the Alleghanies, and so onward to the Atlantic, traversing Kentucky, Tennessee, the Carolinas, Georgia, Virginia and the Middle States. Converts were reported by hundreds and thousands. Atheists, deists, and formalists vainly opposed it; they were either silenced or converted. Many notorious sinners were among the Gospel trophies of this campaign. Churches sprang up in many localities with surprising suddenness and old congregations were augmented and strengthened.

America's "Reformation"

This great revival, which some writers have designated "The American Reformation," produced lasting results. It found society at a low moral ebb, with irreligion and infidelity startlingly prevalent. It checked those evils and brought personal spiritual religion into prominence. It gave birth to evangelizing enterprises and launched missionary societies, tract societies and educational societies. It gave the Gospel to our neglected frontiers, and to the negroes and Indians. It was indeed a celestial visitation, and it was followed by many others. It struck deep, and had a more far-reaching influence than any religious movement that had preceded it.

To the churches, the reawakening brought new life and increased energy, as well as the potentiality of augmented numbers. In all the Protestant denominations there was a marked advance, and this period of activity and prosperity was prolonged for years. This was the case in New York, New Jersey and the New England States. In many New England churches there had been no spiritual refreshing for twenty-five, fifty, or, in some localities, even a hundred years. Rev. Mr. Storm, of Braintree, a well-known pastor, declared that until a revival in 1811, there had been "no stirring of the dry bones" in his church in a full century. Even some of the oldest churches had never experienced an awakening at any time during their entire history.

From 1808 to 1813, owing to the war and other troubles disturbing the nation at that time, there were few revivals, though the growth in church membership and activities continued. In 1816, notable awakenings took place in New York, Philadelphia, Albany, Troy and several other cities, with many conversions, and in the following year the church reports tell of "wonders of mercy" in New Jersey, with 1,500 conversions, and almost equally large numbers in New York State. From 1815 to 1825, not less than 50,000 additions were made to the Presbyterian Church as the fruits of revivals. In the first thirty years of the last century, the Presbyterians added 120,000; Congregationalists, 65,000; Baptists, 213,000; Methodists, 410,000—representing an average fourfold increase, an experience never before known.

Condition of the Country

Some outspoken divines have left us not very alluring pictures of the social and religious conditions in the early part of the last century. Writing of Illinois in 1804, the Rev. Jacob Young said: "The bulk of the people are given up to wickedness of every kind. This is the worst section of all for stealing, lying, and fighting." Rev. Jesse Walker wrote of St. Louis in 1820: "The population is made up of Catholics and infidels, very dissipated and wicked." Of New Orleans in 1805 the Rev. Elisha Brower wrote: "The Lord's Day is a day of general rout in the city. Public balls are held, traffic of every kind goes on, including public sales; wagons are running, drums beating, the race tracks are open beside the doors of the churches, the people swear, and the priests swear as hard as the people." At another place where this pastor preached, the people had never heard of the Fall, and one man asked "when it all happened." In 1804 the Christian Sabbath had not got as far as Detroit or Mackinaw. In the Southern cities, Sunday was a day of social dissipation.

Among the pioneers of the Cross in those early days were Peter Cartwright, Peter Akers, Jacob Knapp, and E. N. Kirk. All the early writers agree that the moral condition of the country, in the West especially, was lamentable. Many families had not heard the Gospel in eight or ten years. In Ohio there were places where no sermon had been preached in fifteen years. "It seemed," said one writer, "as if Satan had plotted the destruction of the young nation. A preacher might travel hundreds of miles and look in vain for a church. The people in many localities were little better than heathens." Sporadic awakenings had been noted in a few scattered localities before the great revival began, but these were mere skirmishes—affairs of the outposts, by way of prelude to the greater battle to follow. Some few churches had been praying and seeking earnestly for a spiritual outpouring, and there were many faithful souls who, realizing the great need of the time, had been diligently preparing the way by fasting and supplication. There were at the time many different opinions regarding the scenes and manifestations at revivals which took place between 1800 and 1820. One writer

Sometimes the sudden agony appeared to be only the culminating point of previous feeling; at others, the sense of sinfulness penetrated the soul as with a lightning flash. Some persons were overcome with unutterable horror by the idea of an angry God and eternal damnation; others were prostrated with shame and sorrow, for "trampled under foot the Son of God." Peace was invariably obtained by looking to Christ alone for salvation. The cry, "Lord, Jesus, mercy on my soul," burst from every heart. No description convey any idea of the joy that followed. It filled the heart, and upon the lips, and beamed from the dull face with a new radiance. A spirit of prayer was invariably developed. People in this purpose at various hours of the day. Family worship was established in many houses, and supplication for the conversion of neighbors, friends, and relations became general.

Adverse Criticism

Adverse critics and enemies of the work, being them without spiritual perception, attributed the various manifestations and phenomena to contagious hysteria and similar causes. specially pointed out that cases of bodily prostration, thcries, faintings, singing, leaping, etc., were "valueless as a the work of the Holy Spirit," asserting that they were real result of powerful mental impressions on natures unaccus to self-control. But such an argument, while it might be enter if the subjects under consideration were poor, ignorant, stitious peasants, utterly failed when applied to the circumstances of the case. Among those who were "stricken of the Spirit," it is true there were unquestionably some poor and illiterate; but the very conditions which led to their prostration, produced the same effect upon lawyers, merchants, bankers, society women, judges, and hard-headed men of business. The worldly, critical theory, which might be employed to explain isolated cases, collapses when it is confronted with a vast Pentecostal tidal wave which swiftly envelops, not a few earnest, impressionable persons, but audiences, entire communities, hundreds of towns and cities, a dozen States, and which wins over from sin and triumphs carries into the Kingdom half a million immortal souls in a single campaign. Such results are the direct work of Omnipotence. And whether the process involves the extreme physical phenomena presented in some revivals, or is comparatively the result attained, under Divine direction, will be the same is not necessary, however, to make these physical manifestations a test of genuine conversion. College Revivals

Nearly all the leading American colleges were touched the revival spirit in the first decade of the last century. 1802, Yale, then under President Dwight, felt the influence. several years preceding, there had been a mere handful of ch members in the college—only eleven men, it was said. small group opened an "upper room" for prayer, with Jerer Evarts as one of the leaders. Soon seventy-five students fessed conversion. In 1808, thirty students were converted 1822, twenty-four students, and still larger numbers in 1827

Dartmouth College had four distinct revivals—viz.: in 1815, 1819, and 1821. In the second of these, over sixty students were converted. Amherst had revivals in 1823, 1827, 1831 and 1835. Three-fourths of the students professed religion. Every class had an awakening of its own. A large portion of the students entered the ministry and consecrated themselves to the mission field. Williams College had repeated ones, that of 1805-6 being led by Samuel J. Mills and James Ards, students, who afterward became prominent evangelists. In 1831, simultaneous revivals were reported in fifteen colleges, with three hundred converts.

Finney and his Times

After the turbulent strife and intense political excitement which followed the war of 1812, had subsided, religious agencies spread rapidly. From 1820 to 1832, revivals followed in succession, and churches sprang up. Among the noted evangelists of this early period was the Rev. Asabel Nettleton, who began his ministry at 1811. Later came that remarkable group, which included Charles Grandison Finney, Jacob Knapp and John Lord. About new measures were adopted for "bolder and more denunciatory preaching, praying for persons by name, inviting seekers to 'anxious seat' and committing them to specific promises." In 1827, New Hampshire saw the first of the famous "Four-Day Meetings"—inaugurated by Rev. John Lord and copied thereafter in many States—the whole time being devoted to religious exercises. A blessing fell on cities and rural districts alike. In

New Haven, in 1831, nine hundred were converted. The same year, 1,500 towns and villages felt the grateful influence of the revival, and over 50,000 persons were quickened and professed conversion.

The "power from on high" descended wondrously, and in the revival of that year, pastors, congregations, theatres, banking houses, mercantile establishments, all shared. In old Chatham Theatre, New York, the stage was given up to singing, and the barroom to a prayer meeting, for seventy successive nights, and similar meetings were held in many other places, resulting in a mighty harvesting of souls. From 1826 to 1829, it was estimated that 200,000 united with the leading Christian denominations, 60,000 of the converts being young men. Among the many remarkable spiritual workers of that bygone era, the personality of Charles Grandison Finney stands out in picturesque prominence. In his memoirs he tells us, with interesting frankness, the story of his conversion, and his call to labor in the Lord's vineyard. Born in New England, in 1806, educated at Yale, and entering the profession of the law in Adams, Connecticut, he had reached his twenty-sixth year before he began to enjoy religious privileges. He found the authors in his law books frequently quoting from the Scriptures, and this so whetted his curiosity that he bought a Bible, the first he had ever owned. He read it carefully, meditated on it, and soon decided to abandon law, and adopt theology as a profession. On a Sabbath evening, in October, 1821, when he was 15, the final struggle began which resulted in his soul's salvation and peace. During this experience he recorded the resolution, "Ever I am converted, I will preach the Gospel." True to his word, no sooner did he realize the change than he began to tell his experience among his neighbors. Within thirty-six hours, they had won many to Christ, and had fairly begun his first ministry. He won over, among the first-fruits of his ministry, his parents. He was a magnetic speaker, imposing in stature, in a dignified manner, a voice at once clear, flexible and of powerful compass, and a manner of gesture and intonation, with the command of language, that made him irresistible with an audience. He was a stern logician, and at the same time a touching and even tender orator, and could deliver the "thunders of the law," or appeal to the hearts and feelings of his hearers with equal effect. A giant in debate, a Demosthenes in his sublime flights, an Elijah in the spiritual fullness and impressiveness of his address, he was hailed everywhere as one divinely chosen and specially fitted to stir the hearts and consciences of the people. Plots were made to entrap him, and to "silence the disturber," but all were providentially doomed to failure. God's hand was so clearly in Finney's life-work that even his bitterest enemies were ashamed and confounded.

A Whirlwind of Revivals

His career was a succession of spiritual triumphs amid the most unusual difficulties, and the story of his experience is the very romance of evangelism. In Evansville, Jefferson County, N. Y., he told an audience which complimented his preaching that he "didn't come to please them, but to bring them to repentance," and spoke so plainly to their consciences that they were filled with anger and started in a body for the door. Next day they threatened to "ride him on a rail." That evening he addressed them again, urging repentance. A revival broke out after the meeting closed, and was kept up all night long, resulting in the conversion of nearly the entire community—liquor-sellers, atheists, blasphemers and drunkards included. At a German settlement, the people left their harvesting on a week-day afternoon, packed the church, and soon the whole settlement was under conviction. Many remarkable conversions followed. A village near Ogdensburg had been named "Sodom," on account of its notorious wickedness. Finney got the people together and his words fell on them "like a smiting sword." An old, white-headed man sat in the middle of the hall. Pointing at him, the preacher cried: "Can't you pray?" This person, unknown to Finney, was practically the only moral man in the community. He fell upon his knees and poured out his petition. Soon nearly all were praying. One after another was led to Christ. That wicked community was wholly transformed and renovated—a revival of the power and fullness of Divine grace. These are only examples of scores of similar experiences which this wonderful man of God passed through. His preaching stirred up revivals in New York, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Ohio, Connecticut, and other States. With a force and eloquence which his contemporaries declared "made men shudder," he preached the law, its penalties and its justice; the Gospel and the Divine goodness; and the fearfulness of sin. He was a keen metaphysician. He held the Bible as a revelation of "the highway of holiness," and that regeneration and conversion were synonymous and simultaneous. He pressed home the doctrine of the atonement. His language, which before his conversion was ornate, was after that event, as plain and direct as he could make it. "It was the language of the common people," he wrote, "expressed in few words and in words that were in common use," never vulgar, but clear and simple.

"The Great Awakening"

There are many persons still living who can recall the wonderful revival of 1857-58, which was known as "The Great Awakening." For years religion had been at a low ebb, and infidelity permeated all classes. As the result of a widespread financial panic, multitudes were flung into deep depression, and businesses and fortunes were swept away in the avalanche. Pastors of all denominations united in imploring the Divine intervention, with supplications that were watered with their tears. They issued a call for general prayer for an outpouring of the Holy Ghost. Sorrow and trial bring the heart nearer to God, and in their adversity the people turned to Him for relief. Business men in New York responded, slowly at first, then eagerly, to the invitations. A noon-day prayer meeting was opened by Mr. J. C. Lanphier, a pious city missionary of the Dutch Reformed Church, who was the founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, which has been continued to the present day. Soon similar meetings were held in other cities. The movement spread; the people were turning to God, and within a few weeks the revival was under full headway. Not only were the churches crowded, but Burton's Theatre in New York, Jaynes' Hall in Philadelphia, and the largest public halls in Brooklyn, Boston, Albany, Baltimore, Richmond, Cincinnati and Chicago were crowded by tremendous audiences, eager to hear the Gospel.

Soon the revival became trans-continental. Like flames amid dry grass, fanned by a strong wind, the conflagration spread from State to State. It was a veritable Pentecost. Conversions were reported in all parts of the country. Even sailors on shipboard, out on the open sea, felt the Divine influence, and crews and officers were brought to Christ. Telegraph wires were burdened with the messages of salvation. Churches were crowded week days as well as Sundays, and ministers were unable to attend to the multitudes who were seeking the light. Meetings were held in bar-rooms, dance halls, and private houses. Business men forsook the pursuit of wealth and came in crowds at the noon hour for daily prayer. Conversions were numbered by tens of thousands, and included drunkards, criminals, atheists, infidels, gamblers, liquor-sellers, dive-keepers, pleasure lovers, as well as laborers, domestic servants, merchants, learned professors, distinguished jurists and a great multitude of fashionable women. For such a harvest the field had been ripening. Half a million souls were swept into the Kingdom.

There was no hysteria, no flaming evangelism. Even the sermons were conservative in tone, and for the first time the secular press published revival doings as news. Prayer-meetings and lay efforts were the chief agencies. In one week it is estimated that fifty thousand were converted, and during the whole revival three hundred thousand were added to the churches. From 1857 to 1859, the Congregational Church alone received thirty-eight thousand accessions, and the Methodist Church in one year, 136,036—truly a glorious harvest!

The Revival of 1875

War demoralizes the spiritual condition of a nation, and the period of our Civil War was not an exception. Peace, however, brought bright promise of renewed revivals. In 1874-75 took place the last great awakening of the century, the leader being Dwight L. Moody, whose remarkable spiritual powers as an evangelist were fully equal to those of Finney. With his associate, Ira D. Sankey, Mr. Moody had already become well-known throughout the English-speaking world, when, on returning to the United States in 1875 from an extended evangelistic tour abroad, he found the home field "ripe to the harvest." A great revival work was begun in the Clermont Avenue Rink, Brooklyn, on October 24. Soon the fountains were stirred and all denominations crowded the meetings; Moody's oratory and the tremendous vigor of his appeals went straight to hearts and awoke conviction. He reached the masses as none had done since Finney's time. Fifteen to 20,000 persons attended the different services daily. In the old Pennsylvania Railroad depot, and the Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, and later in the Hippodrome, New York, the revival was continued, and even greater audiences heard the Gospel gladly. In one day it was estimated that 25,000 people attended the Hippodrome services. There was no false enthusiasm and no sensational episode. Boston, Chicago, Kansas City, Nashville, Louisville, St. Louis, Augusta, and other cities passed in succession under the spiritual conflagration. Great multitudes were swept into the Kingdom. This memorable campaign was the beginning of an aggressive evangelistic mission in the United States which covered a period of twenty-five years—up to the time of Mr. Moody's death. His consecrated life and work are already well-known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Space does not permit more than a passing reference to those faithful evangelistic workers who labored side by side with the great spiritual leaders in the latter quarter of the century. Many were greatly blessed in their Gospel ministry of exhortation and song. Long will be remembered such consecrated spirits as Philip Phillips, "the Singing Pilgrim," and P. P. Bliss. Among later evangelistic workers, Thomas Harrison, C. H. Yatman, Prof. Torrey, L. W. Munhall, and Rev. Wilbur F. Chapman, have each led many to Christ.

Nearly all the revivals the world has known it owes, next to Christ, to the labors of consecrated evangelists. It owes them a debt that cannot be repaid, and it is fitting that they should be enshrined in men's hearts as God's messengers, divinely chosen to bring sinful man back to peace and happiness through the glorious Gospel. Very Fortunate

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I am in receipt of your very generous premium, The Story of the Hall of Fame, by Dr. Louis Albert Banks. I have been much interested in reading about the building it describes and the persons whose names are inscribed therein. I consider myself very fortunate to secure a copy of this book, with its valuable facts and biographies. While I am very grateful to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for several excellent books given as premiums, I am most particularly so for The Story of the Hall of Fame. South Wallingford, Vt. L. C. NEEDHAM.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR DECEMBER 28.

GOLDEN TEXT — PSALM 90: 1:

"Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations"

JOSHUA COMMISSIONED

JOSHUA was eighty-four years old when he became the successor of Moses, as leader of God's people in their onward march toward the Land of Promise. "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee," was God's promise to him of co-operation. "Then shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life," was the sure promise of success which God gave to him. His instructions from God were: "This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein."

Three elements of success: — God's Presence, God's Help, God's Book.

Maxwell Orr, a sturdy Scotch farmer, married Ellen Ewing, a gentle, timid creature. "Will ye never learn," he was saying to her, "that I want nae puling, poor thing about, who is for aye thinkin' o' the mistakes she'll make, instead o' puttin' her hairt into it like a braw lass, and daen' her best and bidin' by it? A timid wife is a fearsome sight to a man." . . . In the silence of the night God spoke to the troubled heart of the little wife, the Spirit of Love entered into her and showed her that all wisdom, all help, all salvation must come from him. . . . Maxwell was sick unto death. "The body is all right," said Maxwell, "tis the soul that is sick." That night, calmly and trustfully, Maxwell passed out into the light. . . . "Husband," said Ellen, sometime ago, "where is your timid wife now?" "Aw," said Maxwell, smiling, "ye ken fine she went with that husband of hers, and they lost themselves; but thank God Jesus Christ came to seek and to save the lost."

Crossing the Jordan

The Jordan at high tide of spring freshet lay between the Israelites and the Promised Land. Cross it they must, and cross it they could not by any ordinary means, of which they were totally destitute. But something extraordinary was at hand, even the power of their God, who holds the waters in his hand. Joshua was courageous, because he was trusting in God. And Joshua strengthened the courage of the people by sending his officers among them as they rested in their tents, to tell of the details of how the crossing should be effected. And then Joshua called the great congregation together to "sanctify" them, that they might move forward with the Spirit of the Lord within them. The line of march was clearly outlined; first the priests, bearing the ark of the covenant; second, twelve men, one from each tribe, who were each to carry a stone, taken from the river-bed, to be set up as a memorial; third, the host of Israel following, removed about three quarters of a mile from the advance guard. And God rolled back the waters as soon as the feet of the priests touched the river's brink, and there was a path from fifteen to twenty miles wide, with a length of not over six hundred feet. And when the great company of two millions had safely crossed, the waters roll on again in their course.

Just to follow every day where God leads;
Just to scatter all the way sunny deeds,
Just to go, nor question why shadows fall,
Ever looking to the sky through them all.

The Fall of Jericho

The Jordan had been crossed, but Jericho must be taken. The walled city was no less an obstacle to the on-going of the Israelites than the wide and rapid river had been. But the people had courage, because God had brought them safely across the river. The campaign against the city was planned by God himself, and it was given to Joshua that night as he stood alone with the Captain of the Lord's Host, just outside the walls of Jericho, while the people in the city and the people in Israel's tents lay sleeping. Once a day for six days, Israel's host was to compass the walls of Jericho, in quietness; on the seventh, they were to compass the city seven times, and then shout in unison and blow trumpets. And then they were to rush into the city and destroy the inhabitants, except Rahab and her household. And the treasures of gold and silver were to be confiscated for the Lord, and not taken for booty. To the very letter was the plan executed. Achan alone disobeyed orders, and he was punished with death, and all that he owned perished with him.

Joshua and Caleb

An old man with a young heart was Caleb, eighty-five years old, and yet he said: "I am as strong as I was in the day that Moses sent me; as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out and to come in." No one knew better than Joshua how strong Caleb was in those days, for together they had gone to spy out the land. Caleb was then in his prime at forty years of age. He proved his claim of unimpaired faculties by asking for his portion of the Promised Land the very spot which anybody else would have wished to decline, because of its inhabitants, who were giants in stature and in strength. He not only asked for Hebron, but he demanded it, on the ground that Moses had promised it to him at the time when he returned from spying out the land. All he wanted was a clear title, and with God's help he proposed to take possession.

It is said that George L. Mackay toiled as a missionary for three long years in Formosa without getting a single soul to listen to him.

Still he kept on, believing that one with God was an irresistible force. After years of this persistent striving, he won multitudes of souls for Christ. He declares that in all this work he "never saw anything to discourage him."

Cities of Refuge

"Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord," was a form of ethics unknown to the early Jews. Even Moses took it upon himself to kill an Egyptian who was smiting a Hebrew. The "avenger" was a recognized personage. The duty of avenging was laid upon the man nearest of kin to the one slain, either through malice, or by accident. And so blood-thirstiness grew. Most mercifully this was checked by God's command to Moses, that when the Israelites should come into the Land of Promise, six cities should be set aside to which manslayers could flee from the avengers. Not that a premium was to be put upon murder, but time was to be given for hot blood to cool, and opportunity was to be given for investigation, as to whether the killing had been done accidentally or intentionally. There was continued protection if there had not been intent to kill, but the wilful murderer was forced to leave the city of refuge, and be at the mercy of the avenger. The six cities of refuge were located in different sections of the land, so that no person would be far from any one of them.

THE PROMISED LAND DIVIDED BY LOT

Christ is our refuge.
Fly, for the avenger is near thee,

Christ on his bosom will bear thee,
Thou who art weary of sin.

He is not far from every one of us. He will not turn us away for any evil deed, as many have done, if we truly repent.

Joshua's Parting Advice

Joshua, the leader, had not reached the age of Moses, the leader, when God called him to come up higher. Moses was one hundred and twenty years old when he died, and Joshua was one hundred and ten. We query why did God not let Joshua live to be as old as Moses? In either case, the work for which God had created the man was done. We must think it was so, for God's purposes in a life are not frustrated by death.

SELECTING THE TWELVE STONES OF MEMORIAL

JOSHUA ORDERS AN ADVANCE

Moses in his time had called all Israel together for a parting warning and benediction, and so did Joshua, not that Joshua was following the example of Moses, but the Spirit of God was prompting him to leave a message with his people which should be a restraining power after his death. And so it was that "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that over-lived Joshua, which had known all the works of the Lord which he had done for Israel." Joshua prepared the people for this faithfulness by connecting with his farewell, the solemn promise that they would serve the Lord, and by setting up a stone of witness as a seal to their promise.

Time of the Judges

The days of Joshua were "good old times," compared with those which sometimes prevailed during the time of the judges. And yet we must not consider that period the dark ages of Israel's history. There were fifteen judges in all. They were not dictators, but rather defenders and deliverers, and under ten of them Israel was comparatively free from foes without and within. The most distinguished of these judges were Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Eli, Samson and Samuel. Dark times came only when Israel forsook the Lord and served Baal and Ashtoreth. Then it was that the Lord delivered them into the hands of spoilers. The judges were raised up by the Lord to deliver Israel when repentant, by wise counsel and by acts of daring.

Drunkards of Ephraim

Samaria was built upon a terraced hillside, surrounded by an exceedingly fruitful grape-growing country. The vintage therefrom had wrought the undoing of the people, they were drunkards, as were many of the people of Judah also, Isaiah's own country; not excepting the priest, and the prophet, and the judge. "They also erred through wine." Their condition was not unknown to God, who sees all things. And God sent Judah words of warning through his prophet Isaiah, that even as Samaria was being carried captive through drink, Judah also was bringing upon itself national dishonor and death.

Gideon and the Three Hundred

In all the annals of war, there is no other great victory achieved by so small a force as that of Gideon. Never were such contemptible weapons as "lamps, pitchers and trumpets" used against spears, and swords, and death-dealing arrows. It was honor enough for all participants to be counted as being with Gideon's band on that wonderful occasion when the host of Midian "ran, and cried, and fled." It was honor, indeed, to be one of three hundred whom the Lord selected out of the great army Gideon had first gathered together, thirty-two thousand. And why did God choose them? Because they showed, when tested, that not self, but God's cause was uppermost in their thoughts.

Ruth and Naomi

In Ruth and Naomi sweet friendliness has a most charming setting. It is spoken of in all the world, wherever God's Book has gone. It has inspired the painting of beautiful pictures and the composition of soulful music. It has set a universal pattern for love at home. A husband's mother, or a wife's mother should have the place in one's heart next to one's own mother, should be a mother-in-law as well as a mother-in-law. The drawing power of love caused Ruth to follow after Naomi even to a far distant land. More than this, it drew her away from the false gods of Moab to worship the true God. But love costs something, many hours of hard work as a gleaner in the fields it cost Ruth, in order that she might sustain the life of Naomi. She expected no reward for such loving services, but it came to her.

The Boy Samuel

The child prophet is one of the sweetest pictures in Old Testament times. We seem to see him now with flowing hair, dressed in a white, priestly robe, performing such services as a child could in God's house, such as opening and closing the doors, and trimming the lamps, and doing errands for the aged priest, Eli. Samuel was so faithful in the performance of his boyish tasks, that even sleep did not interrupt his readiness for a call to duty. It was no cross to him to be awaked out of sleep by Eli's call. And so he was all the more ready to respond when God called him. It is not strange that he should have once, twice, even three times, mistaken God's call for Eli's. But when he recognized that God was calling him, the child was not dismayed. He had been trained to think of God as his friend and Master, and so he answered, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

Birth of the Messiah

God hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all, by whom also he made the worlds. Heb. 1: 3. He came to earth from heaven, who was Lord of all. And when he bringeth the first begotten into the world, he saith, Let all the angels of God worship him. Heb. 1: 6. The words which the angels spoke to the shepherds, "Good tidings of great joy to all people, that Christ, the Lord, is born this day," were a fulfilment of the words spoken by the prophet Isaiah, who said, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, The everlasting Father, and The Prince of Peace."

II.—The Right to Develop Along Its Own Lines. As to Home Government

I WOULD like to put a good deal of emphasis on the word develop. We are too ready to educate our children from the outside; to decide what they shall be and do, and to ignore nature's leadings in their training. People sometimes wonder why this or the other family, brought up under Christian influences, turn out badly when grown. "The Deacon was very strict with his boys, yet see what they are now!" Alas! the poor Deacon was so bent on securing respect and deference to authority and obedience to his own rules of right and wrong, that he imposed his will on his sons, instead of so teaching them that their wills grew in the direction of harmony with the divine will.

Education that is in conflict with nature must result in producing freaks and monstrosities. To be successful, it must run along the heaven-indicated lines of talent and temperament and go hand in hand with symmetrical development. If we are violent and arbitrary in our treatment of children, they may fear punishment and obey us for that reason; but they will inevitably grow timorous and furtive, and have the spirit and demeanor of slaves. When the reaction comes, to those who are strong, there will be far-reaching consequences of disaster. The weak will escape better, but the pity is, their weakness might have been developed into strength.

I cannot too often or too earnestly beg parents to regard as immensely important in child-training these two qualities—freedom and sympathy. Give the child breathing-room, standing-room. Try to comprehend the child's point of view. Do not attach too much importance to the work of the school. Home comes before school.

I once knew a small maiden, who at nine did not know a letter of the alphabet. She did know a good deal about birds and insects, nests and cocoons, a good deal about leaves and flowers and gardening. For books and slates she had an aversion. The children in her house were taught at home by their mother, and this lady, after awhile, became alarmed at the completeness of her daughter's ignorance. She spoke to her husband, a noted man of letters, and he smiled at her annoyance.

"Never mind," he said, consolingly, "wait till Ruth asks to be taught to read; then teach her."

They waited. After a while Ruth did request to learn to read, and when once she began, she learned so fast that her progress appeared almost miraculous. She is now, and has for some years, been a very distinguished teacher, and she is, and will always be, a very painstaking student. She was allowed to develop, not forced to learn.

Of course, this is an extreme and exceptional instance. Most children should attend the best school in their neighborhood, and should be required to prepare their lessons thoroughly and to pay all attention to their teachers. Every parent should visit the school which his children attend, and be personally satisfied as to the atmosphere they breathe, the light in the schoolroom, and the height and comfort of the desks at which they sit.

I suppose my middle-aged readers can recall a time when every girl, whether or not she had any special aptitude for music, was expected to take piano lessons. At great self-sacrifice in many a home, a piano was purchased, a teacher was secured, and the youthful daughter of the family was taught to read the notes and play five-finger exercises and scales. Even these were not, however, very thoroughly taught, the idea of the instructress and the ambitious mother usually being to teach the child "a piece." When she could play "Home, Sweet Home" with variations, or "Monastery Bells," she was considered proficient enough to plod on by herself, unless her parents could easily afford a longer period of tuition. Walking down a village street, one used to hear the strumming of the piano in every house, and while some children learned sufficient of the intricacies of the piano to give pleasure to their friends and themselves, others found it a torture which they hated. Many girls grew round-shouldered and pale while they practised the hours on which their teachers insisted, and to many of them, the ordeal was a foolish waste of time and pains.

We know now, what our predecessors did not, that to constrain an unmusical mind to spend the best part of its morning of life at a keyboard, is absurd, and we give the musical education, or the art education, or the purely literary education, if we are wise, to the child who has a bent in a given direction. We recognize the child's right to its own natural development.

May I speak on the negative side now of a matter on which I feel very deeply? It is of the child's right not to be snubbed. Fathers are greater sinners than mothers in this special particular. They seem to regard it as a manifest duty to snub the lad, who, at the awkward age, when his hands and feet are pushing out, and his figure is ungainly, and his voice a bit uncertain, has troubles enough to bear, without being uncivilly addressed by his elders. I have seen a boy's face flush, and have sympathized with his brave effort at self-control when his father has ridiculed him, or rebuked him in the presence of the family or of friends. The parent who does this from want of thought is making a great mistake. The one who does it of set purpose and from habit, commits a crime. Children have a right not to be hurt. Their feelings, their disappointments, their sorrows, are as real, as well worth considering, and as important, even if more evanescent, than our own.

Why will people persist in putting false ideas and notions of coquetry and consciousness in children's heads, by sly remarks and bantering and chatter about sweethearts? Comradeship is often marred by this unwisdom. In the world of outdoors, in some games, in study and in social intercourse, let boys and girls associate on equal terms. Each boy gains from friendship with every girl, and every girl learns some good thing from her boy companions.

THE WISE MOTHER

Make Friends and Companions of your Children

An inalienable right of all children in this period is to be believed when they speak. No child should be frightened into a lie. Truth is largely an affair of understanding and of atmosphere. In a home where all are frank, where there are no concealments or evasions, where perfect sincerity prevails, and parents keep their word, children will usually tell the exact truth. Falsehood will not occur to them. There will be no motive to be untrue. During early years, some imaginative children, living in a strange wonder-world of their own, do invent and relate some amazing stories. The parent should discriminate between these narratives of a creative fancy, these bits of drama evolved from imagination, and the untruth which is intentional and perhaps malicious. I tell you, dear friends, to bring up children aright in this one matter requires help from on high, and no mother should attempt it in her own unaided strength.

One word more. This is about property rights in the child's world. Your child, as soon as possible, should be allowed to have certain possessions of its own, and no other child in the family should be permitted to trespass on those possessions—toys, dolls, blocks, books, or whatever they may be. A busy mother sometimes snatches the toy of an older child to appease the clamor of a younger one. If she does this, she is a highway robber, teaching her children confusion and not clear ideas of the rights of property.

The best thing we can show in home government is justice. It is the best preparation for the life beyond the home. In the nursery we may lay the foundations of good citizenship. Anarchy has no place there. The right of the stronger to oust the weaker is always non-existent as a right, though it has been exercised ever since Adam and Eve left the garden of Eden. Absolutely, it should not be tolerated in the household. No little one should trespass on the property of brother or sister. Johnny's bat and ball, Tim's pony, Lottie's work-basket, should each belong to him or her, and nobody borrow or use any of these things or possessions without the consent of the owner. How shall we teach generosity, charity, almsgiving, real love, if we have not justice first as the underlying rock on which the rest may be built?

Then, an inalienable right of each small man and woman is to be given a place for his or her treasures, and taught to keep them in order. It is more trouble, possibly, for a mother to insist upon order than to pick up after the children; but here she may not consider trouble, the children's good being the point on which so much depends. A little row of pegs, which children may reach, where their outdoor clothing may be hung, shelves not too high for them to keep their books upon, drawers of their own, a room of their own, and daily lessons in keeping everything tidy, are among the most valuable of children's rights.

A Constant Talker

When I was a child, we had a neighbor, harmless enough, I dare say, but the terror of her friends because of her endless chit-chat. She was not malicious, she said nothing unkind; but the patter of her ceaseless monologue went on and on and on like Tennyson's book: "Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever." Oh, the weariness of having to listen to one who has nothing of interest to say, but who has fallen into a habit of dribbling speech, her tongue, as the old people say, hung in the middle. A good many young women lament their inability to converse well. It is really not very important that one should talk; it is often much better to be silent. Let one learn to be an attentive and sympathetic listener, and one need never fear that she will be unwelcome in any company.

Ways of Earning Money

The woman who can discover for herself a new way to earn money is fortunate beyond her neighbors. The familiar old ways are not within reach of everybody, for not everybody can do beautiful needlework, or fine washing and ironing, or even delicate cooking. In some places there is no market for any of these accomplishments. Women do their own work, and have no need to hire assistance. The other day I heard of a new way of earning money, which a gentlewoman successfully practices in New York. She acts as escort to elderly ladies who do not see very well, but who like to go about in the evening, to concerts, to lectures, or to church. They pay her by the hour. Another clever woman goes about and amuses children by telling them stories. She has regular story telling afternoons, and charges a small admission fee. The thing is to have initiative, to ascertain or invent a new want, and then to fill it. Any one who can do this will surely put money in her purse, and be able to assist her family. Most women desire to earn money that they may give a timely lift to a friend in need.

"THE WHOLE WORLD IS QUEER"

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM XXXVII The Psalm of Patience

"CUT DOWN LIKE THE GRASS"

1. Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.
2. For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb.
3. Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.

This Psalm is for Christians who worry and fret, and "it's wicked to worry." God is more than circumstances and David here proves it. Praying people should be patient people. Neither wickedness nor the wicked will be our neighbors forever. We will part company.

PSALM XXXVIII The Psalm of Corruption

"AS A HEAVY BURDEN"

3. There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin.
4. For mine iniquities are gone over mine head: as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.
5. My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness.

Here is the plague hospital that follows the disease of sin. "My wounds stink"—"My loins are filled with a loathsome disease"—groaning, roaring, panting, feebleness, disquietude, derision all come in the wake of iniquity. If sinners here can taste such sorrow, what will come when Satan, hereafter, adds to the woe.

There is a vast difference between having God as our friend and Satan as our enemy, than Satan as our friend and God as our enemy.

PSALM XXXIX The Psalm of Silence

"I WAS DUMB WITH SILENCE"

1. I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue: I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me.
2. I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.

Those queer people who talk too much, need this Psalm. There is too much use of lips before the heart and mind have ripened the thought. "Silence is golden." Oh! for a million of millionaires by this process. The gold standard here will get universal support. Whoever Jeduthun, the chief musician, was, David gave him in this, a choice piece of music. Dumb people even can sing it.

PSALM XL The Psalm of Salvation

"OUT OF A HORRIBLE PIT"

1. I waited patiently for the Lord; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.
2. He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.
3. And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord.

Here the voice of Jesus is heard before the Hosannas sung, and until the Judgment, his speech will be of Salvation. He lifts people up out of the pit. He puts their feet on the Rock. The new song is in their mouth because he saves them from their sins.

"Let such as love thy Salvation say continually: 'The Lord be magnified.'"

THE HOME IN HEAVEN*

A Place where the Aspirations and Desires of Heavenly Souls Will be Gratified

POETS and preachers have had much to say about heaven, but how little we really know of it! The only authoritative, reliable knowledge we can have on the subject is from the Bible, and that gives only meagre information. John is the only one of the inspired writers who makes any serious effort to describe it, and his Revelation is obviously figurative. The vision he had, seems to have passed his powers of description, and he could present the grandeur and beauty of what he saw, only by employing as images the things that men regard as most precious. The streets paved with gold, the foundations of huge jewels, the gates of pearl, are evidently merely symbols of the dazzling glory which was indescribable. Elsewhere in the Bible, the terms are of the most general character. Christ spoke of it as "the house of many mansions"; Paul spoke of it as "a building of God, a house not made with hands"; and Peter as "an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled." From none of these can we gain any intelligible idea of what heaven is.

Perhaps it would be impossible for us to understand, even if we had been told. It may require a sense, that in the body we do not possess. Or, it is possible, that in this matter, God wished us to trust him altogether, without definite description. Our duty is confined to this life, and it is with that, that the Bible chiefly concerns itself. There is no ambiguity about the fact of another life beyond this, nor as to the fact that it will be happy or miserable, according to our conduct in this life. That is all that it is necessary for us to know, and we may safely trust God as to the details. It will be well with the righteous, and it will not be well with the wicked. It is so to a great extent now in this life, but in the future the difference will be more marked, and the conditions in both cases will be immeasurably intensified. Yet it is very natural for us to wish we knew more about that unseen world. So many whom we have loved have entered it, that we would like to know where they are and what they are doing. Paul gives the most direct and comforting assurance, when he tells us that to be "absent from the body is to be present with the Lord," and that dying is going "to be with Jesus," to which he adds the statement, that we could well believe without his authority, that "it is far better." We must, therefore, content ourselves with the certainty that in death, as in life, we shall be in the hands of a loving and beneficent God.

After all, the Bible does tell us enough, even by negatives, to inspire us with a longing to dwell in heaven. The things that distress and embitter our lives here, will, it assures us, be unknown there. The list is so long, that if the things it comprises were removed from us now, our lives here would be heavenly. There is to be no night there, no pain, nor hunger, nor thirst, nor sorrow, nor weeping, nor sin, nor lying, nor defilement, nor death; no marrying nor giving in marriage. We are assured, too, that the will of God will be done there, which is always the highest good of man; that all who are there will serve him, and all who have ever served him here, testify that there is no service which gives so much happiness. Truly, the picture is alluring; but it is attractive only to sympathetic natures. That, too, is in accord with the Bible teaching. People who would not enjoy such a life are unfitted for it. They exclude themselves. If in this life, their thoughts and desires are centered on earthly, fleshly things, they would be out of place in heaven and would not be happy there. As they do not voluntarily go now, to places where there is no provision to gratify their tastes, so they will have no desire for heaven, where all is spiritual. It is the pure in heart, the people who long for righteousness, and only they who would be contented to spend the years of eternity in such a heaven as is described.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

SCRIPTURE PROBLEM, NO. 2

This picture represents a scene described in the Old Testament. Write a description of it, not more than twenty words in length. First read the rules carefully.

WELL, children, here we are again! More prizes, more puzzles, more entertainment for you, this cold winter weather.

First, a word about last week's competitions. You may send in your attempts for these at any time, provided that they reach this office not later than December 24. The correct answers and the names of the prize-winners will be published in the paper as soon after that date as possible. This week we print another Scripture problem. The artist has drawn a scene which is described in the Old Testament, in Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel or Kings. It is for you to find out which, and to write out a little description, not more than twenty words in length, of the scene which the picture illustrates. That is one of this week's competitions.

The other competition will perhaps be made more interesting if we begin by telling you a story. Once upon a time there were two children, a boy and a girl, who lived in a pretty little home in the country. They were very happy and very excited looking forward to Christmas day. One thing which made them so happy and so excited was the thought of the presents which they knew quite well they would receive from their father and mother. They could not help wondering a great deal what these presents would be, and, indeed, I think they talked of nothing else as they played together in the woods on Christmas eve.

What was their surprise, when there suddenly appeared from behind a tree a beautiful fairy.

"Children," said the fairy, in a voice which was as soft and sweet as silver water flowing between banks of gold, "you are very busy, I see, talking about the presents which you expect your mother and father will give you. But I would like to know what you are going to give them."

The little girl was the first to recover from her astonishment.

"We haven't thought of that," she said, hanging her head, and feeling so ashamed she did not even dare to look at the lovely fairy.

"We haven't got any money, you see," said the boy, kicking the snow with his boot.

"You don't need money," said the fairy. "The woods are full of presents."

You can imagine how surprised the children were, and how they looked about when they heard this.

"I don't see 'em," said the boy.

But the fairy was pointing to the holly bushes, with their pretty red berries, and to the evergreens, with which the woods were full.

"Pick those, little children," she said, "and take them home to decorate the house as beautifully as you can—every berry and every leaf and every bunch will be a present your father and mother will value, when they know you have taken all that trouble to give them pleasure."

The children were very grateful to the fairy, and at once began to fill their arms with the green branches.

"There are four principal places to decorate," said the fairy, who kept on surprising the children by all she knew, "the front porch, the parlor, the dining-room and your mother's bed-room. Now if I were you, I should write out a text to hang on each door, and frame it very prettily with holly leaves."

"What texts?" said the boy and the girl together.

But the words were hardly out of their mouths when the fairy had disappeared.

"We shall have to choose them ourselves," said the girl.

"That will be fun," said the boy, and off they started for home, dragging the big bundle of evergreens behind them.

Now what would be the best texts for those children to choose—what would be the most appropriate text to decorate each of those four doors in a home? This is the second competition for this week.

Competition No. 1 Scripture Problem No. 2

The picture represents an incident described in the Old Testament, in either Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel or Kings. Write a description of it, using not more than twenty words, in your own language.

Competition No. 2. A Curious Question

What would be the four most appropriate texts in the Bible with which to decorate the front door, the parlor door, the dining-room door, and a bedroom door in a house, for Christmas?

No competitor shall be over fourteen years of age. A reader may enter one or both competitions. They are quite distinct. But no reader may send in more than one attempt for each competition. There is no rule against asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in his or her answer in his own handwriting.

distinctly in Luella's strong contralto. "I'm a-goin' to do it. I'm a-goin' home this very day! I can't wait no longer!" The tremulous fingers were groping blindly for the glasses, which her provident daughter-in-law had taken from her, "for fear you'll break 'em while you're asleep."

Ten minutes later the little lady stood bonneted and shawled at the door of her bedroom. "Now, if Luella hears me," she murmured, "She'll take my things an' put 'em where I can't get 'em agin'; she said she would. An' I s'pose the front door's locked; I see her put the key in her pocket yest'day. But I'm a-goin' home—I'm a-goin'!"

It wasn't far from the sill to the ground; but to climb from the stealthily opened window was a feat which almost exhausted the feeble limbs. "I'm dretful glad there wa'n't anybody a-passin'," said the escaped prisoner, with a hysterical little laugh as she cautiously made her way through the sodden grass.

She paused behind a big lilac bush at sound of heavy steps on the sidewalk, then pushed boldly forward and opened the gate. "They ain't anythin' out the way in my jes' steppin' out for a spell," she assured herself. "I've got good eyesight, an' my rheumatiz is cert'nly better. I guess it's done me good to visit at Luella's. But then I don't want to wear my welcome out a-visitin' anywheres. As I says to father; home's good 'nough for me, I says. An' he says to me, mother, he says, you're right; they ain't no place like home."

The unwonted exhilaration of the open

In Competition No. 1, the answer must be written on a postal card, or on one side of a sheet of paper. The name, age and address of each competitor must be clearly written at the top.

In Competition No. 2, the four texts chosen must be written out, giving verse, chapter and book of the Bible. If more than one sheet of paper is used, they must be numbered. The writing must appear on only one side of each sheet. The name, age and address of the competitor must be clearly written at the top. All attempts must reach this office on or before December 31st.

Competition No. 1. The prize for the best description of the picture will be a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. To the fifty readers sending the next best answers, we will give a beautiful book, bound in rich white velum, with holly decorations in green, red and gold.

PRIZES.

Competition No. 2. To the reader who sends in the best selection of texts, we will send a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. Fifty consolation prizes of the beautiful book mentioned above will also be awarded.

Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

Beyond Expectation

The premium Bible received, and in good condition. Allow me to say that it is beyond all expectations. I am simply astonished at the liberality displayed. air and the joyous anticipation of homecoming quickened the tardy steps till the village was quite past. The fitful March wind blew coldly through the budding maples and clouded the spectacles through which the longing eyes descried the familiar home road, stretching away rough and brown beneath the darkening sky.

"The goin's dretful bad," sighed the weary pilgrim, "dretful bad—an' I'm tired a'ready. If only father'd come along now, a-drivin' the colt. He'd say, Why, mother, is that you? An' then he'd tuck me up nice an' warm with the buff'lo robe. Father's always so good to me!"

She had toiled steadily along through the half frozen mud for perhaps an hour—it seemed a painful age, when a cold, weeping mist closed in around her. "Why, I'd ought to ha' brought my umbereel," she thought. "I wouldn't like to be laid up first thing for father to look after." The labored breath came fitfully now, the chilled pulses scarcely seemed to beat. "Lead Thou—lead Thou me on!"

It was growing dark, and the faltering feet slipped more than once into icy puddles, which lurked amid the frozen ridges and furrows of the difficult way. Suddenly through the mist and the gathering night gleamed a long, bright finger of yellow light. The piteous little figure stood still and gazed at it through bewildered tears. "It's father," she whispered; "he's lit a candle; he's set it on the table close to the kitchen window. I guess he knew I was a-comin'!"

A College Course at Home

A Practical System for those who wish to Educate Themselves

COURSE IV.—A Commercial Training

By FRANCIS RANSOM LANE, M.A., M.D.,
Principal of the Brooklyn Polytechnic Preparatory School

THIS commercial course is planned to meet the needs of a great number of young men who enter business at an early age, and who desire by a few hours of home study to improve their general education and to train themselves in the technical subjects that are of chief use in business life.

The Subjects

The following subjects are suggested:

English Grammar, English Literature, History, Commercial Geography, Commercial Arithmetic, Civil Government, Bookkeeping.

The commercial arithmetic supplements the general course in arithmetic with the special applications that are needed for a commercial career. The study of commercial law forms a preparation for the knowledge of contracts, agency, partnership, corporations, commercial paper, insurance and other legal matters that must be acquired by an alert man of affairs. Bookkeeping should also be studied to fit the pupil for a mastery of the principles involved in retailing, wholesaling, commission sales, consignments, importing, agencies, real estate, manufacturing, stock companies, brokerage, banking, and all kinds of commercial paper and financial statements.

At the same time the technical studies must not be allowed to crowd out other branches that are essential to the training of an intelligent citizen.

It is not of course necessary that all the subjects should be taken up at the same time, and many may find it to their advantage to devote themselves to one study at a time. But if two hours a day can be devoted to work, the following schedule might be followed:

A CONVENIENT PLAN FOR A WEEK'S WORK

40 Minutes for Each Subject:

| MONDAY | English Grammar | Commercial Geography | History |
|-----------|--------------------|-----------------------|----------------------|
| TUESDAY | English Literature | Commercial Arithmetic | Commercial Geography |
| WEDNESDAY | Bookkeeping | Commercial Law | Civil Government |
| THURSDAY | English Grammar | Commercial Arithmetic | History |
| FRIDAY | English Literature | Bookkeeping | Commercial Law |
| SATURDAY | Rest | | |
| SUNDAY | Rest | | |

The following text-books are suggested to cover this course:

English Grammar

Carpenter's First and Second High School Course in Rhetoric and English Composition. (The Macmillan Co., New York.)

Scott & Denney's Paragraph Writing. (Allyn & Bacon, New York.)

Lowell's Vision of Sir Launfal.

Scott's Ivanhoe.

Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield.

Plutarch's Life of Alexander.

Preston & Dodge's Private Life Among the Romans.

Dickens' Tale of Two Cities.

Mahaffy's Survey of Greek Civilization.

Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies.

If on taking up the course you need any further suggestions or advice, we shall be pleased to help you. Address CHRISTIAN HERALD, Educational Department, Bible House, New York.

History

McLaughlin's History of the United States. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Commercial Arithmetic

Horton's Commercial Arithmetic. (S. S. Packard, New York.)

Commercial Geography

Adams' Elementary Commercial Geography. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Bookkeeping

Bryant & Stratton's Common School Bookkeeping. (American Book Co., New York.)

Packard's Higher Bookkeeping. (S. S. Packard, New York.)

Commercial Law

Burdick's Essentials of Business Law. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Civil Government

Young's Civil Government of the United States. (Maynard, Merrill & Co., New York.)

Upset Her.

People that don't know about food should never be allowed to feed persons with weak stomachs.

A little over a year ago a young woman who lives in Mercer, Me., had an attack of scarlet fever, and when convalescent was permitted to eat anything she wanted. Indiscriminate feeding soon put her back in bed with severe stomach trouble and inflammation of the kidneys.

"There I stayed," she says, "three months, with my stomach in such condition that I could take only a few teaspoonfuls of milk or beef juice at a time. Finally Grape-Nuts was brought to my attention and I asked my doctor if I might eat it. He said, 'yes,' and I commenced at once.

The food did me good from the start and I was soon out of bed and entirely recovered from the stomach trouble. I have gained ten pounds since my recovery and am able to do all household duties, some days sitting down only long enough to eat my meals. I can eat anything that one ought to eat, but I still continue to eat Grape-Nuts at breakfast and supper and like it better every day.

Considering that a year ago I could stand only a short time and that a glass of water seemed 'so heavy,' I am fully satisfied that Grape-Nuts has been everything to me and my return to good health is due solely to it.

I have told several friends having nervous or stomach trouble what Grape-Nuts did for me and in every case they speak highly of the food." Name given by Postum Food Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

OLD FOGY KNEW.

Experience Teaches People.

"My parents considered coffee simply a harmless beverage for old and young, so when a mere baby I commenced to drink it, and when I reached womanhood, found myself troubled with nervousness, headache and an irritable temper and to obtain relief, I drank more and more coffee, thus adding fuel to the fire.

I grew worse until life was one black night of pain. My nerves were shattered, body wrecked with suffering, my stomach gave out and utterly refused to digest the most simple foods, and finally I lay for weeks starving and longing for food, but unable to eat more than just enough to keep me alive.

While in this state, my next door neighbor brought in a fragrant cup that I supposed was some new grade of coffee, and although I had suffered so terribly from its effects, the temptation was too strong to resist, and I drank it with relish. I noticed it had a rich agreeable taste and I drank it without distress. She repeated the kindness two or three mornings.

I began to congratulate myself that it was not coffee that hurt me after all. I was assuring my friend of this one day when she astonished me by saying that I was not drinking coffee, but a pure food drink called Postum Food Coffee, made from nourishing grain for building up the system and nerves instead of tearing them down.

I then began to drink Postum regularly, and to get well slowly but surely. To-day I am a strong, hearty woman; my nervous system is entirely rebuilt and with a reserve force of strength in time of need; I sleep well and awake refreshed and feel bright for each day's task, with no indigestion or stomach trouble, and a good, strong active brain ready for any mental strain or toil. There is no doubt on earth that coffee nearly killed me.

A friend of mine was obliged to resign her position as school teacher, because of extreme nervousness caused by coffee drinking. I induced her to use Postum in place of coffee, and at the end of four months she began teaching again, her nervousness gone and feeling and looking ten years younger; her sallow complexion having become a beautiful, healthy bloom." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

THEIR HUNGER MAKES THE MEAL A ROYAL REPAST

THE NIGHT-WANDERERS' BANQUET

A Thanksgiving Eve Dinner at the Bowery Mission Described by One of the Converts

FRESH from Australia, with its genial cities by the sea and its vast inland deserts beyond forests of gum trees; fresh from Sydney, with its valley of violet waters under skies of alluring azure, I found myself in this amazing metropolis of New York.

I have traveled a good deal, having seen all sorts of life. I can almost say that I have worked at enough trades to make a weathercock weep with envy. I have been through the perfumed moonshine of the rich and the starving storm of the poor, and that storm has wafted me into many wonderful corners in Australia, Europe and New York.

The Bowery has a name for being the haunt of incorrigible sinners and loafing men. A man told me once that it was wicked enough to make a saint's eyebrows stand on end, while as for the loafers, their only ambition was to drink. I found that all this was error, and that the Bowery was far more orderly than the streets of many Australian and European capitals.

On Thanksgiving morning I went to the Bowery Mission. What a phenomenal neighborhood it stands in! A vast, moving mosaic of dense cosmopolitan life and passion, where virtue and vice appear so mixed that it would puzzle a committee of hieroglyphs to discriminate.

Long before three o'clock in the morning, a motley line of men were waiting to obtain free coffee and rolls at the Mission. Here was beauty of silent kindness on the part of those who control this Mission: a poor man, without saying a word, could walk in and receive nutriment, doubly welcome at such an hour to those who were homeless. Most of the men were intelligent, and all of them orderly—a wonderful medley of humanity, from sailor to sexton, poet to ploughman, vocalist to undertaker's mute, and cook to lawyer's clerk. The "black sheep" of the family was there, wishing he were at home again. All of them down, cornered, desolate and overwary, but among them not one incurable sinner.

It would be hard to tell which their hearts desired most, sleep or food. Think of it! How merciless is this sleep-denying world! Beneficent nature was urging them to sleep, but man's ordinances forbade them to close their eyes in slumber or even to lie down on the stones, as some of the more tired felt inclined to do.

There were touches of grotesque humor among the men as they waited outside the Mission door. One specimen of social dilapidation observed: "We're dead, not alive; we're a lot of warmed-up corpses waiting to return underground."

At last the night-wanderers can enter and have their coffee. How welcome is the cup of coffee and the accompanying rolls to the homeless ones! They invoke silent blessings on those who furnished the fare, simple, but ambrosial to them. Some of the menu-heroes of the famous hotels would like to enjoy their exquisite banquets half as well as these outcasts enjoy their rolls.

At 9 o'clock A.M., twenty-five baskets, each containing a chicken, two loaves of bread, potatoes, turnips, one pound of coffee, one pound of sugar, one pound of prunes, and a half pound of butter, were given away to the poorest families in the neighborhood.

In the evening there is a glorious assemblage in the Mission Hall; the place is full of smiles and welcomes. First comes a lively march on the organ. The "Bowery boys" are proud of their organist, for, although he can soar into the realm of ethereal harmonies, he has listened with them to the deep undertones of the universe. For this particular night he has set to music a poem of bright earnestness and tender appeal, entitled "Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving," the words by the Superintendent of the Mission. These words were suggested, I believe, by a passage in a child's letter written to her father—a convert of the Mission. Mrs. Hallimond sings the song with feeling, that leaves no one in the audience unthrilled.

Then Mrs. Bird, "the mother of the Bowery," rises and addresses the assemblage. Affixed to the front of the organ is an evidence of her thoughtfulness; it is a wreath of everlasting flowers encircling the words "Mother, Home, Heaven." She has felt that these words are everlasting stars in the wilderness of man's life. Every one in the audience likes to hear her cheery tones as she says "Good evening, boys." Many an obdurate old sinner feels that her influence on his life is like sunshine on the cypress. Many a young one has known her to charm the discouragements from his life.

Next, Dr. Klopsch gives just the right kind of talk to make the most excellent specimen of social dilapidation present, feel like "a hero at zero," as a man in the audience put it. There was nothing abstract about the doctor's remarks; he proved to the men that adversity's real name is aspiration, and that the winds of the world breathe energy onwards. Poverty is another term for possibility, and he gave concrete instances of how men have risen from the depths, and overcome obstacles by patient fortitude and noble emulation.

Then the Superintendent speaks. Evidently he does not believe in the existence of incurable sinners. As he discourses, the grace of yesterdays that were pure comes back to many a flowerless life in the audience.

After a concluding march on the organ, the men receive their Thanksgiving dinner. Each man, as he passes through the kitchen, receives a banquet in a box, which he may either take home, or eat in the basement, as he pleases. The basement becomes merry; it seems transformed into a magic hall of moving jaws; some of the men are so hungry that they soon gesticulate the banquet down their throats. It is indeed an acrobatic banquet. Turkeys, sweet potatoes, and pies, disappear with a celerity that is wonderful.

What a graceful act it was to put a flower in each man's box! J. G. HARTLEY.

MAKING THE NATION

The Story of the Beginning of the Hebrew Commonwealth

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE books of Joshua and Judges, tell of the home-coming and home-life of the weary pilgrims of the wilderness.

The book of Joshua, which is the first book in the Bible which bears the name of a man, places Joshua, who bore the name, and who was especially a type of Jesus, as a Sequel to the Pentateuch. Genesis, the book of beginnings and of generations; Exodus, the book of coming out; Leviticus, the book of worship; Numbers, the book of the wilderness; Deuteronomy, the book of repetition; naturally lead up to Joshua, which is the book of possession and victory, of rest and inheritance. It speaks of the realization of what the people of Israel had looked for and journeyed towards. Many of our hymns make Canaan to be a type of heaven; but it is much more really a type of that rest of soul, that possession of God and being possessed by God, which our beloved Lord has purchased for us, and which, as our Joshua he leads us into now, if we accept him as our leader, our captain, and take the shoes from off our feet in reverence, obedience and faith.

Joshua was fallible, but He who is our Leader is infallible. It was by taking things into his own hands, undertaking too much, that Joshua failed at Ai and with the Gibeonites. Here, also, we learn by contrast how our Leader, who voluntarily took upon him our own nature, with its powerlessness to do anything of itself, and whose Father, dwelling in him, did the works, is our guarantee that we may tread the same path. Joshua involved Israel in his mistakes; our beloved Lord involves us in his victory. He makes a way, through his unvarying obedience, for us to tread in his steps—a way which fallen human nature neither ever trod nor could tread before.

In the Book of Judges, we find Israel without a leader, every man doing that which was right in his own eyes (Jud. 21: 25.) They had the Word of God, they had the high priest; if their hearts had been right, they had laws enough to keep them from all that was evil; but the circumstances of prosperity in Canaan neither shut out the tempter, nor changed the natural evil of their hearts; and in point of fact, the people were, on the whole, better off under the severe discipline of the wilderness than when they were continually falling into sin, and lay under the judgment of God, who delivered them into the hands of their enemies. They would have been glad enough of the wilderness fare, the manna, once again, when the Midianites came to reap their harvests, when instead of their pleasant home-life with orchards, vineyards, and flourishing farms, they were driven into the mountain caves for a home, and were suffering hunger and thirst because of their sins.

Again and again God delivered them by raising up and working through a judge, but the heart of the people, as a people, was never wholly turned towards God; they never accepted their vocation to be a holy people unto the Lord, and the Lord could never alter his purpose regarding them. "They grieved his Holy Spirit, so that he was turned to be their enemy, and himself fought against them" (Isa. 63: 10). It was a sorry history, and it is a solemn lesson to us. If they, as a nation, were called to be a separate people, we as individuals, members of the body of Christ, are indeed called to be separate, "not of the world, even as Christ was not of the world." If we do not enter into God's thought and purpose regarding us—that we should be to the praise and the glory of his grace (Eph. 1: 6)—how can we enter into his glory? It is if we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together, not without suffering.

Oh, how Israel dragged God's honor in the dust, and profaned his name among the heathen (Ezek. 26: 21.) "Of how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall he be judged worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?"

WHAT IS LIFE?

THIS earthly life
Is filled with strife,
All down its thorny road;
The fruit of sin,
That finds within,
The place of its abode.
But there's a life
Devoid of strife,
With sunlight all aglow;
A hallowed ray
Lights up its way;
My brother, will you go?
That crimson flood,
Christ's precious blood,
Will cleanse your guilty soul;
Affliction's rod,
The frown of God,
Ne'er shrouds the Christian's goal.
Watch out for rest,
With all the blest,
Where flowers forever bloom;
For all is bright,
With heaven's pure light,
Beyond the Christian's tomb.

Knew Three "Immortals"

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I received a copy of The Story of the Hall of Fame, for which accept sincere thanks. It is a book in which every American must be deeply interested. To many of us who have had the pleasure of seeing or knowing some of the "elect" it is doubly so. Three of the "immortals" I have seen many times. Near one of them—that genial Christian gentleman, Washington Irving—it was my privilege to reside. He wrote a page in my album—in the performance of which neighborly kindness he deviated from his known custom, which was to decline writing in autograph books.

Called Higher

In a recent death notice in a newspaper, the following letter, signed, "Mrs. E. F. Bloom. On her deathbed," was published: "I want the whole world to know of my Jesus. It pays to serve Jesus in health and disappointments, for he keeps you in perfect peace, and now it has come to a test that I may be laid aside through suffering. And yet I had blessings upon blessings to help me through whatever he sees best. It seemed to me this morning in my bedroom as if there were angels of light wherever I looked. Doesn't it pay now to serve Jesus?" Mrs. Bloom was forty-two years old, a tender wife, a mother, and an active Christian worker in the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, Jersey City, N. J.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Answered in Present Issue

How far would a young man be justified in taking part in the diversions of society, in order to meet influential men and women and so to advance his own social and business standing?

To be Answered in Issue of Dec 31

Should the intellect be the master or the servant of the emotions?

SPECIAL NOTICE

On and after Jan. 7, 1903, THE MAIL BAG will be devoted weekly to replying to letters received from readers in all parts of the world. This departure is rendered necessary by the increasing volume of correspondence of this character. Elsewhere in the paper, frequent opportunity will be afforded our readers to unite in a Symposium of opinions on a stated question, dealing with some one of the live topics of the day.

Answers to Question of the Week

How far would a young man be justified in taking part in the diversions of society, in order to meet influential men and women and so to advance his own social and business standing?

Social Diversions Overvalued

He would be justified in such a course only so far as he could go without sinning against his body, mind or soul. He is apt to place too high an estimate upon such diversions; whereas, his advancement in social and business standing upon other things—straightforward, unswerving integrity of character, unquestioned moral uprightness, purity of mind, heart and life. With reference to his advancement as stated, he should heed the injunction of our Lord, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness and all those things shall be added unto you."

B. F. WHITEMORE.

Social Culture Profitable

A young man should not spend an undue allowance of time in meeting influential persons, or in the diversion of society, such a large proportion of time as would hinder him from doing good work in any way he may be called to labor. He must not be led from the plain path of duty by false delusions. It is well for him, however, to have a clear conception of the time which he can and must properly spend in meeting superiors and in social culture. Some time spent in such a manner is essential and necessary to his own well being. Every young man can judge for himself on this question.

ALBERT J. MAXON.

The Dangers of Society

If by "society" is meant what is popularly known as our "Four Hundred," and if the young man's diversion therein, in anyway interferes with his Christian principles, he is not justified in such a pursuit after wealth and preferment. Society generally entails extravagance, late hours, wine-drinking, card-playing, and very frequently unwholesome companions. Worldly society is a poor place for a young man to meet those who will give him a helping hand, and it is a very empty, unstable affair to which to pin one's hope of advancement. In the majority of instances, it is better and wiser for the upright young man to leave society alone.

ALICE A. BOYNTON.

Pernicious Pleasures

The seeking of social distinction and financial success by the "diversions of society" will lead to the dance hall, the euchre party and the whist club. A doctor settled in a small town and was soon invited to meet with a party of just such people as inquirer doubtless refers to. Did he accept the invitation? No. He wrote a note thanking them for the courtesy accorded him, at the same time stating as a Christian physician he must respectfully decline. The result was no more invitations, but in about a month from that time a member of one of those families was taken seriously ill and this doctor, although of another school of medicine, was sent for. The patient made a rapid convalescence, and, in less than two years, the doctor was the acknowledged physician of nearly all that coterie. They evidently thought that one who had the moral courage to carry out his convictions, would be a safe one to trust when sickness came and the angel of death seemed to be near.

S. A. H.

Social Relaxation a Necessity

To mingle socially with influential people is beneficial, not only because it naturally tends to give one refinement and to advance his business and social standing, but also on account of the pleasure and relaxation which up and bless. His follower may do the same, carrying true thought, high principle and unselfish living among his fellows; and helping them, through the moral atmosphere we all create about us for good or evil. Henry Drummond was such an one.

Good Society a Blessing

A young man is fully justified in mingling with the society of which his ambition is to become a part, as a means of attaining that ambition, if it be a laudable one. The society of upright business men, their diversions and their families is one that is not likely to prove detrimental to a young man; on the contrary, it is more likely to prove a permanent benefit to him. However, no young man can in the least be justified in entering, or striving to enter, the society of superiors if his aim is modern society. To gain confidence he must stand for the right.

M. F. C.

The "Happy Medium" Advised

To go into the very best society he can find, is a wise thing for a young man to do. If he goes into society not at all, he becomes narrow and short-sighted; if he goes into society too much, he is soon unfit for any company, even his own; but if he can find the "happy medium" of going out just enough, and then among the very best company, those superior to him in wisdom and learning, he is not only justified in so doing, but does himself an injury by not doing so. He will seek the society of some one, and if he cultivates the acquaintance of those above him, he will be benefited, uplifted, educated.

M. L. G.

Advantages of Social Diversion

Contact with influential men and women is, in itself, a form of education, and refined social intercourse is often an effective aid to young men in overcoming bashfulness, self-consciousness, awkward behavior, and in acquiring that ease of manner and conversation, the lack of which proves always a serious handicap to a young man's effectiveness, however good his intentions. In this world we are "to be satisfied with our possessions, but not with ourselves, until we have made the most of them." It is, therefore, not an unworthy ambition to embrace every advantage which will increase our talents.

M. S. WILLIAMS.

Miscellaneous Questions

H. M. R., Kingsville, O. What is the meaning of "divinity circuit?"

The "divinity circuit" is a term used by bookbinders to describe the circling edges which overlap the leaves of a Bible bound in soft leather. A circuit is something which "goes round"—the "divinity" has reference to the fact that this style of binding was considered particularly adapted for the use of divines.

I. A. B., Brooklyn. Is it true that there was at one time a bridge across Broadway, New York?

A bridge called the Loew Bridge, because built by the efforts of C. E. Loew, was put up in 1867, crossing Broadway from the northeast to the northwest corner of Fulton street. It was taken down the following year.

C. J., Akron, O. What is the primary cause of Chinese longevity?

The Chinese are noted for the fact that they are the exact opposite of what we mean by "high-strung." As a rule, they may be said to take life complacently—in a word, they are never in a hurry, and, as a result, they manage to live to a good old age.

Reader, Morristown, N. J. What is the origin of the name, "Red Sea?"

In the Coptic version, the term phiom ushapi (Hebrew, yam-suphi) is translated literally "Red Sea." Gesenius and other authorities translated suphi as rushes, reeds or seaweed. A seaweed, red and resembling wool in texture, is thrown up abundantly on the Red Sea shores; hence probably its name. Others have held that it may have been so designated from the red coral, the presence of myriads of reddish zoophytes in the water, or the red-hued storks that hover about its borders. Still others believe it to be the Sea of Edom, which means "red."

Rev. "THE LITTLE LORD JESUS ASLEEP IN THE HAY"

LUTHER'S "CRADLE HYMN"

AWAY in a manger, no crib for his bed,
The little Lord Jesus lay down his sweet head.
The stars in the heaven look down where he lay:
The little Lord Jesus asleep in the hay.
The cattle are lowing, the poor Baby wakes,
But the little Lord Jesus, no crying he makes.
I love thee, Lord Jesus, look down from the sky,
And stay by my bed, watching my lullaby.

come with such diversions, to the tired body and brain, after a day of close application to business. One should exercise great caution, however, lest he become so fascinated with society as to allow it to interfere with his regular business habits or his health. Life is too real and too earnest for this. To obtain social honors and pleasures should never become the object of one's existence, but simply an aid to better, more useful living.

MRS. J. C. R.

Asceticism Not Advisable

Presumably he is a Christian man, desiring to do what is best for himself and his Lord, or he would not raise the question. The people who could advance his social and business interests rightly, would be men and women of integrity and refinement, who would gather about them people of like tastes, and their social diversions would be pure and wholesome. Our Lord was not an ascetic. He touched human life at every point, to lift to sail under false colors, and attain a place and standing in society which he is not fitted to occupy from a moral, educational or business point of view.

WM. W. CASE.

Two Kinds of Diversions

It is no sign of a holy character to withdraw from society. Our Master did not so teach by word or example. His first miracle was not wrought in the temple, but at a wedding feast. He accepted the invitations which came to him. Man needs companionship and sympathy. He is at his best a social creature. The diversions of society are of two classes, some are innocent, helpful, healthful, commendable; others are unhealthy, destructive, immoral. The young man if he aims at permanent success may freely indulge the former; but to win and keep the confidence of influential men and women in society and business, he must draw the line between the two classes of diversion and refuse to yield to the immoral tendencies of

INDIAN FARMERS AT ROSS' FORK

THE ROMANCE OF FRONTIER MISSION LIFE

BY MRS. J. B. FUNSTEN*

WHEN Lewis and Clark, at the head of their wonderful expedition, came to the Continental Divide, and saw the waters of a little stream rolling towards the west, they rejoiced to think that at last their footsteps were being turned directly towards the shores of the great Pacific Ocean, and that their arduous journey seemed nearing its termination. They had as their guides, through the deep canyons of the Rocky Mountains, the Shoshone Indians. It was therefore with great pleasure that about the middle of June we went from Boise City, Idaho, to visit the Mission at Ross' Fork among the Shoshone and Bannock Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation, for we felt an especial interest in observing the work that was being done in the christianizing of these people, who had acted as faithful guides for the first white men who came over the mountains in 1803. Only a short time ago, "Old Ocean," a Shoshone Indian, died not far from Ross' Fork. When a young man, he belonged to the party of Indians who acted as guides to the Lewis and Clark expedition.

Some fifteen or sixteen years ago, the Connecticut Indian Association secured one hundred and sixty acres of land, and built a mission-house near Ross Fork. This has been recently turned over to Bishop Funsten, of the Episcopal Church, and an excellent work has been carried on here by a number of missionaries, prominent among whom is Miss Garrett, of Williamsburg, who, strange to say, as an infant was baptized in the very font which was probably used at the baptism of Pocahontas, the first Indian who was christianized in Virginia. We arrived at the station early Saturday morning. The air was pure and delightful. Far away to the north-west, across the broad and sage covered valley of the Snake River, were to be seen the beautiful Lost River Mountains, with their rugged crests covered with snow; while to the east, the foot-hills and the higher mountains connected with the Rocky Mountain system rose in striking majesty. Just a quarter of a mile away, was to be seen the very attractive mission-house. This is a bright, ary. This was much enjoyed after getting off some of the dust of the travel, which is an inevitable concomitant of this semi-arid region.

It happened that this Saturday was the ration day, so that when we reached Ross Fork already quite a number of Indians were assembling, coming from miles around to get their share of Uncle Sam's apportionment for them. The mission building is near the main road, so that during the long summer days we spent there we had an opportunity of studying Indian life, for at all times there were some passing to and fro on horseback or foot. They have a great objection to being photographed. Often they would come into the mission-house without knocking, and walk through till they found some one, and then, with the silence of a sphinx, they would sit for hours, unless moved to remark that they were "heap hungry," which of course moved us to set before them some simple repast, which often opened the way for a heart-to-heart talk about the truths of the Bible and the love of the Father in Christ.

On Sundays, after the Sunday School and service, a number of Indians would usually stay to dinner. There was a large table for them in the hall, and we had some of them at our table also. There was a certain dignity and refinement in their manner that made it a pleasure to see them enjoy the day in their quiet way. When they came to ask questions about God's Word, none could doubt the sincerity of their quest after truth. Every evening, some came to prayer in the Assembly Hall and the men would stay a while after service, talking with the Bishop, or receiving his explanations through an interpreter. One day, as I sat in my room on the ground floor, an Indian woman walked quietly in and took her seat. She said nothing; but I found she could understand partly what I said, so I tried to teach her something of the love of God and his willingness to help them. Often during these summer days,

The MANGER CHRIST

TEXT — Luke 2: 12:
"LYING IN A MANGER"

HOW large is an average crib? "I suppose," you answer, "about four feet long and two feet wide. It is as large, perhaps as an average manger at the end of a horse's stall, at which the four-legged animals munch their oats and hay, after a long, tiresome day's work." Yes, my friend, you are right. Your definition is so completely right that, in this Christmas sermon, I am going to preach about a famous manger, which was once used for a cradle. I am going to talk about a stone manger, hewn out of the solid rock, in which nearly 2000 years ago, was laid a new-born babe; about this manger the Wise Men from the East, and the shepherds from the surrounding hills gathered, and over it the angels sang the first lullaby in the chant of the Christmas song. This stone cradle was the manger of Bethlehem of Judea. It was the first earthly resting-place of the Divine Child, who was the Son of Mary the Virgin, and was also the only-begotten Son of the Father God.

But while we may try, in this Christmas sermon, to picture the Manger Christ, yet we must be careful not to weaken our picture by reciting too much the false legends and the fictitious stories that have been written about the Bethlehem khan. We must remember that the many Christmas superstitions may be a positive hindrance and confusion to the Gospel student, as the wrong use of books can sometimes weaken the intellect of a modern professional man. Only the other day, I had this idea vigorously emphasized. In conversation with a prominent Western judge, I asked him the question, "How can you account for it, that in the youthful days of Abraham Lincoln, Illinois was able to develop so many great legal minds? There was practicing at the Illinois Bar, not only a Lincoln, but also a Stephen A. Douglas, an Elihu B. Washburne, a David Davis, a Sidney Breese, a Norman B. Judd, a Leonard Swett, a William H. Herndon, and a score of others, with notable legal brains. These men had seemingly no legal advantages. They went from county seat to county seat on horseback. They had comparatively no books, and but few reference libraries." With that, the judge turned and put his hand upon me, as he impressively said, "Mr. Talmage, you have now touched upon one of my pet beliefs. I believe, in this age of multitudinous printing-presses, that books can often be a positive detriment to a man. These men had great legal minds, because their intellects were not stunted by too much reading. They learned, first, the great underlying principles of the law. Then, upon these true principles used for a foundation, they concentrated and focused all their brain power, to write out their cases. In that thinking and solving, they made themselves great." So to-day, in this Christmas sermon upon the Manger Christ, we would cover up all the fictitious descriptions which the famous artists have painted. We would close the lid of every book which, in legend, would try to tell us that on the night Jesus was born, the sheep, and the goats, and the cattle, and the horse bended the knee as did the Wise Men, to worship at the feet of the new-born Child. And in the simple nativity account, written by the biographer, Saint Luke, we would find four underlying Gospel principles or reasons why Jesus should have opened his earthly eyes first in a stable, and not in a palace.

The whole rendering of the verse of my text reads thus: "And this shall be for a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." The manger is a simplified and tender manifestation of the Divine love. It is not difficult for the average uninspired man to think of Jehovah as a God of majesty, of power, of fiery passion; a God who can hold the seas in the palm of his hand, and a God who can unsheathe the fiery swords of the lightning. Why, even the heathen in the darkest days of barbaric superstition were able to think of such gods as that. When the Euroclydons were born in the Mediterranean archipelago, and instantly sprang up as full-grown giants, and with their swiftly moving feet, leaped from wave-top to wave-top, and drenched their long locks and wide-flowing robes with the white foam, and out of a mere satanic desire to destroy, hurled the shipping upon the jagged rocks, and covered the surrounding coasts with wreckage, it was a very easy matter for the ancients to picture a Neptune striking right and left with his trident, and to call him "God of the seas." When the mighty conquerors of the East made triumphal entry after entry into the city of Rome, with dethroned kings chained to their chariot wheels, and with their legions loaded down with captured spoils, after whole regions had been brought under the shadow of the sceptre held in a Caesar's hand, it was not a very difficult matter for the Romans to build a great temple to Mars, the "God of War." It was not a very difficult matter to rear this gigantic temple, even though thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women had to be sacrificed at its shrine, and though the walls of the temple had to be covered with the captured trophies. Even the Hebrews were and are ready to worship such a temporal king. Only the other day, the chief rabbi of the West, declared in a Chicago newspaper that his people were still expecting a Messiah who would come as a temporal conqueror, to lead the Jews back again to Palestine. Then these modern Hebrew crusaders would again see Jerusalem restored in all its past grandeur; and there Jesus would reign with greater power than the famous King Solomon of old.

But though it was not difficult to think of God as a God of power and temporal conquest, it was difficult in the time that Jesus was born, to think of the Father as a God of love and sympathy and mercy; a God who would deign to care for an individual human being; a God who wanted to creep into the human heart's affections, even as the sunbeams would steal into the heart and give new life to the plant. It was difficult, in one sense, for God to teach sinful men that he did not want to crush them, but to save them of their own free will.

THE ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS AT THE BETHLEHEM MANGER

It was difficult for him to teach all men, both Jew and Gentile, that Christ did not come as a Hebrew Christ, but as a World's Saviour. So, if we may use an imaginative description, God the Father might have spoken to Jesus Christ in a way something like this: "I will not allow thee, my only Son, to be born in a palace; I will not allow thee to enter the world as an earthly prince; sinful men might then honor thee and fear thee, but they might not then take thee into their hearts, and of their own accord love thee and give themselves to thee. I will send thee forth as a helpless babe. I will let thee be born in Bethlehem of Judea, so helpless that the lowliest of the lowly will not have a more humble entry into the world than thou. Go forth, my Son, not only to atone for the sins of the world, but also to teach all sinful men that I am God the Father, the God of Love." Could the Divine love have been manifested in a more simple way than by Christ's cradle being the manger of Bethlehem of Judea?

On October 20, 1895, I was brought face to face with the true teachings of the Manger Christ as never before. It was one of the most overwhelming days of my life. It happened in Bethlehem of Judea. I was sitting in the Greek Catholic church, which is supposed to have been erected directly upon the identical spot where Jesus was born. In that hallowed place I had read over and over again the account of the Nativity, until it seemed as though the walls of the Eastern edifice were changed into a stable, and the light, which was burning upon the altar, was a candle-light held in the Carpenter Joseph's hand. And while I read the Nativity account over and over, I suddenly heard the soft whisperings of a chant. I listened, and at first said, "It cannot be; no, I am listening only to the echoes of my own imagination." But the faint chanting began to grow louder. Then I saw a multitude of people coming through the church door, as the shepherds must have once crowded through the entrance of the ancient stable. Then the procession came nearer and nearer, and laid at my feet the body of a little child. As I sat there and looked at the face of the dead baby whose funeral was now taking place, my heart went out in sympathy to the poor mother. I seemed to be carried back to the time when the Divine Babe lay in that stable Manger, shielded by the mother-love which is always a divine love. And, standing by the Bethlehem Manger, with the dead body of that village babe at my feet, I could realize, as you in the same surroundings could have realized, that God's love for all his children is a tender, pleading, yearning love—a divine love which "passeth all understanding," and which abides with us through life and beyond death.

The Manger Christ was given as a human example for sinful man to follow this side of the grave. He came to prove that by the grace of God, it is possible for a human being to overcome sin. He came to prove it, because Christ was born just as we are, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. He was tempted just as we are tempted. Therefore we must continually, by the Holy Spirit's power, strive to be like him, or else we can be none of his.

We all realize the power of inspiring example in naval and military life. When Admiral Dewey was asked what was his chief inspiration which caused him to enter Manila Harbor, the hero of the Spanish-American war answered: "The name of Farragut. As I steamed towards the Philippines, I kept saying to myself, what would the hero of Mobile Bay do, if he were in my place? Lashed in the rigging, he would defy the torpedoes, and cry to the engineers to go ahead, and so into Manila Harbor I went." The victory of the Pacific Ocean was only the echo of Admiral Farragut's guns at Mobile Bay,—the daring exploit inspired by a heroic example. In the darkest days of the Wilderness, when the Confederate lines were cut in twain, General Lee drew his sword and placed himself at the head of his troops. General Gordon declared that this heroic action moved his soldiers to a perfect frenzy of physical and moral courage. And as the result of this example of their great leader, a successful charge was made. So God the Father gave to sinful men the human example of the Manger for a purpose. God practically comes to you and me and says: "O, sinful man, your salvation was not wrought out for you by an act of atonement performed in heaven. To redeem you from sin, more was needed than sacrifice. It was necessary to set before you an ideal life.

Therefore my only begotten Son took upon him a human form and lived among you that you might see what human nature can become when God dwells in it. I allowed Christ to lie in a manger that you, O children, might copy his life when Jesus was a little boy. I did this so that you, O man and woman, could copy his matured life when you are in the great struggle of earning a daily livelihood. I did this so you might forever have before your eyes the power of a human example, who was tempted as you are tempted, and yet who by the power of the Holy Spirit, sinned not."

The Manger Christ emphasizes the fact that infinite results which may affect all the heavens and the earth—results which will startle the outmost circumferences of the universe, as well as the great centre, can sometimes be directly traced to seemingly infinitesimal causes. When a prince or a princess—the child of a great king—is about to be born, especially if the prospective infant is to be the heir to the throne, a member of the cabinet awaits the arrival in one of the anterooms of the royal palace. The telegraph wires thrill with joy as soon as the expectant message is sent to the furthestmost parts of the royal domains. But no such joyful and national expectancy greeted the earthly birth of the Son of God. No messenger that night carried the news up to the Jerusalem Palace of Bloody Herod the Great. No retinue of foreign ambassadors stood near to offer their congratulations to an earthly king. Jesus' birth, from a worldly standpoint, was an insignificant event. So our second birth may have been, in the estimation of the world, a seemingly insignificant event. But if we thereafter only make a right use of our lives, their proper, which reminds one of the old-fashioned front of a New England meeting house. Within are ample rooms

AFTER visiting many mosques in Cairo, the city of a thousand minarets, it is refreshing to the western traveler to pass from Cairo's famous garden into the cool rooms of the American Chapel, either for rest or for worship. Its doors are all times open, and a welcome is assured to the tourist by some one of the corps of mission workers here. The mission-house is a large three-story building, the monotony of its front broken by the chapel for social and religious meetings and preaching services, where, twice on Sunday and during the week, the Gospel can be heard proclaimed in Arabic.

An Afternoon Sunday service has now been maintained for years, at which eminent English and American clergymen, passing through the country, preach the Gospel in English. This English service is attended by many Arabs in red fezzes, and by students who want to learn the English language. I noticed a number of English soldiers, who came later to the parlors, where a stirring Christian Endeavor service was conducted by one of the missionaries. Several testimonies were made by the soldier boys. Here I heard an address by a convert from Mohammedanism, who proved, by his life of faith, a deep work of grace, which was like the opening of the eyes of the blind. He now holds an important position in the post office of Upper Egypt, and is engaged not only in establishing new offices for the government, but also in establishing missions. He has been called the "Moody of the Nile."

Cairo's American mission, which has developed wonderful energies in its forty-eight years of service, took steps at once to begin religious work, and from the first the work has been successful. Branches of the American mission have been planted up the Nile, and it has now eleven organized churches, with Sabbath morning attendance of between two and three thousand. The mission centres at Alexandria, Assiout and Monsurah have a well-prepared missionary staff. Tradition says that the Evangelist Mark was beheaded in Cairo, after a long ministry, and it is quite probable that St. Peter preached here. There exists to this day, our guide told us, and showed us, a Coptic Church, called the "Church of Babloon," which may have been that which the Apostle Peter referred to in the close of his first Epistle.

One feels that he has reached truly an oasis, on coming to one of those mission stations that dot the map of the Nile. Noble men and women are there upholding the banner of the Cross, such as Dr. G. Lansing and wife, Dr. William Harvey and wife, Dr. Watson and wife, Dr. Pollock and Miss Anna Y. Thompson. The seed is being sown in faith and prayer, and there are constant victories and ingatherings. W. J. PECK.

TWO GROUPS, SHOWING THE MISSIONARY WORKERS OF THE AMERICAN MISSION, CAIRO, AND THEIR WIVES

spiritual influence will affect all time and eternity.

In the world's history, has it not often been revealed that the most insignificant of causes can bring forth the most tremendous and far-reaching results? It seemed to be an insignificant matter, when, many years ago, a humble Puritan with his family and a party of friends wanted to emigrate and set sail for America. But when the English officer at the little seaport town refused to let that humble Puritan leave the country of King Charles, he changed whole leaves in the book of history. Infinitely more momentous was the apparently insignificant event of that birth in the Bethlehem stable, for it was the starting of forces which are revolutionizing the whole world. In your second birth, O man, who can tell what forces may have their beginning affecting the welfare, not of your own soul alone, but of many others through all time and eternity?

The Manger Christ teaches that even in the darkest days of an earthly Christian's life, he is never out of sight of an omnipotent Father's protecting care. As we climb the rocky heights upon which is builded the little village of Bethlehem, and walk along the deserted streets in the midnight hour of the first Christmas day, and see the little candle-light of stableman's lantern flitting about the pale face of Mary the Virgin, we might at first think that God the Father had deserted and left alone Jesus the Divine Son. But did he? Could Jesus, during any time of his earthly life, truly say that the Divine Father had forsaken him, as he once in dying agony asked upon the cross? Oh no. Weeks, or perhaps months before the Nativity, God had prepared a place by which the infant Christ should be able to escape the murderous sword of the bloody tyrant,

Herod. Weeks, or perhaps months before Jesus was born, the strange star appeared in the far East. That star even then had guided the three wise men over the mountains and through the villages, and over the long, hot, thirsty desert, that they should be able to kneel at the manger. It was through the warnings of these three wise men that Jesus would be able to escape into Egypt. In the darkness of that Bethlehem night, angel wings were spread over that humble stable, angel forms surrounded the virgin mother, and angel voices greeted the new-born Monarch of the ages with a heavenly song. They sang so loud that the shepherds upon the hillsides fell down in a swoon. And so in the darkest days of our lives, when we feel that we are forsaken by God and man, God's angels are watching us; God's eyes are seeing us; God's ear is hearing us; God's protecting love is all around us; we are no more forsaken by God than the manger of Bethlehem was celestially forsaken, on the night that Jesus was born.

The omnipresent God will not for one instant, even in the darkest of days, turn a deaf or an unheeding ear to the weakest and most helpless of all his children. God is always ready to listen to your cry, if you will only call upon him for help. God is always ready to protect you with his love, even as his guardian angels and the Star of the East hovered over the Manger on the night that Jesus was born.

Thus, my dear people, in this Christmas sermon, I have tried to preach to you a Manger of hope, and of good cheer, and of Gospel triumph. I have tried to preach this kind of a sermon, because I want this Christmas to be the brightest and the happiest and the merriest of all your lives. I want you to carry into your homes two ambitions: The first is, to make this Christmas the happiest day, in a temporal sense, of your children's lives. Lift high your Christmas tree and light the candles. Give as many presents as you can afford to your loved ones, as the wise men brought the gold and frankincense and myrrh to Jesus. Make the home merry with frolic and fun. And, if it must be, let your children eat as many good things as you can, for just once a year. But the second advice, is of far greater importance. In the evening hour of Christmas night, when the tired limbs and heavy eyes are about ready for bed, tell the little ones, as well as the big ones of the family circle, the great underlying principles of the Manger. Lift the Cross as high as you can. Tell them why Jesus was born, and why Jesus had to die. Then the Christmas day will truly be a happy day and also a holy day. And so, one and all, I bid you farewell, for the most sacred and the best week of the year. I wish you, in a true, pure, spiritual sense, "A Merry, Merry Christmas!"

GEN. GRANT'S WIDOW PASSES AWAY

"WHITE HAVEN"—MRS. GRANT'S CHILDHOOD'S HOME

TRIBUTES of regret from all sections of our own country and also from abroad followed the announcement of the death, in Washington, December 13, of Mrs. Ulysses S. Grant, widow of General U. S. Grant. She breathed her last about midnight in her residence at the Capital. Her only daughter, Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris, was with her. Her three sons, notified the preceding day of the grave turn her disease had taken, had wired that they were starting at once for Washington, but before it was possible to reach their mother she had breathed her last. She had been suffering for some time with cardiac and kidney troubles; and bronchial complications precipitated the end, which was immediately due to heart failure.

On her return from Coburg, Ont., about a month ago, there were grave reports as to her condition. Mrs. Newman, widow of Bishop Newman, pastor of General and Mrs. Grant, happened to be in this office when a paper was brought in announcing that Mrs. Grant had fainted and her physicians feared the worst. To relieve her anxiety concerning her friend of many years, Dr. Klopsch rang up the Grant residence in Washington, over the long distance phone, and the answer came back, by authority of Mrs. Sartoris, that her "mother was sitting up." So quickly she seemed to rally from these spells of physical depression that it does not seem strange that the family were hopeful for the best when the end was so near.

Before his death, General Grant imposed it upon his friends that they should see that wherever he be laid, there should be prepared a place beside him for his wife. A stately mausoleum without her was less desired by him than the humblest grave. So in the Grant Monument on Riverside Heights, provision was made for her interment in a sarcophagus beside that of her husband; and there, with fitting public rite and all due honor, the faithful wife is borne to her repose, after seventeen years' separation from her hero, in whose greatness she believed long before the world had heard of him.

Julia Dent Grant was born February 16, 1826. Her father, Judge Frederick Dent, owned a plantation called White Haven, near St. Louis. To Jefferson Barracks, some five miles distant, came Grant, a shy young soldier, when Julia, bright, pretty and vivacious, was the neighborhood belle. He had been her brother's classmate at West Point; and that fact alone would have opened White Haven to him.

Grant called frequently to see the old folks before

Julia, who was away on a visit, made her appearance. After that his liking for White Haven certainly suffered no decrease; when he was ordered away to the Mexican War, the pair had plighted their troth. Judge Dent's consent was grudgingly given. No one hoped much from the impecunious, dull-looking young soldier. When he returned from Mexico, as the "little man with the big epaulets," he was allowed to claim his bride; and in St. Louis, August 22, 1848, Julia Dent became Mrs. Grant. Winter found them at Sackett's Harbor, New York. "They lived very modestly," one of the musicians at the post has related. "He couldn't afford to do anything else on his pay—but his wife made his humble quarters cosy and homelike. That is the report wherever they went. The wife always conjured up a cosy home out of materials at hand, however unpromising. His transference to the Pacific Coast brought them bitter sorrow. He left his wife and his son, Frederick, then two years' old, at his father's in Bethel, where, soon after, the second child, Ulysses, was born.

One evening, Grant, at his distant post, was witnessing a comrade's delight over a letter from home, and said: "O, I too, had a letter last night," and showed the last page, on which his wife had traced the outlines of his baby's hand. He folded the letter quietly, and left without speaking another word; but his form shook and his eyes were wet. In the intervals of his duties as a soldier, he turned his hand to all sorts of experiments, such as potato-growing, and ice-cutting and shipping, to increase his income. And he failed at everything. Presently he felt that he had failed at soldiering, and sent in his resignation, and went home to his wife. Neither her father nor his took a cheerful view of his ability and his prospects then. Her faith held firm and strengthened him. He felled trees and built a log-cabin, she sitting nearby in the woods with her sewing, while their children played around them picking up chips. He failed as a farmer; tried real estate in St. Louis, and failed again. They went to Galena, where he was to work in the leather business as his brothers' subordinate, at $600 a year. This is the picture of their landing: "Captain Grant (in his old army overcoat) took a couple of chairs in each hand and walked ashore, his wife, a small, alert woman, following with her little flock. There were four children—three boys and a girl—all plainly but carefully dressed, the hand of the mother showing in all things." They took a tiny house on the edge of the town, getting it cheap, because several hundred wooden steps had to be climbed to reach it. Lewis Crowley tells: "His son Fred was about my age, and I was in and out of the house every day. I used to see Captain Grant come home, climbing up the hill, and then in the evening he used to sit and read to Mrs. Grant." At the bottom of the steep stairway, Hamlin Garland relates, stood a little Methodist church, and there Captain Grant, his wife, and their flock of small children were to be seen almost as regularly as the deacons. He was not a church member, but she was, and he readily accompanied her. She kept the children neat, took care of her own house, and found time to "prink" herself and run to the edge of the bluff to meet the captain every evening.

When his first honors, and with it corresponding responsibilities, came to him at the beginning of the Civil War, some one questioned his ability. "Ulysses can fill any position he is called to," said she, proudly.

His letters to her show what comfort and inspiration her confidence was throughout the struggle. When with conquest, fame and glory came to him, it was more his joy that she was glad than that his name was in all men's mouths. In Washington, where she presided for eight years as mistress of the White House, her pleasure, in all social matters, was his first thought. He was not a society man, but he made it a point to appear at her receptions, walking about among her guests and doing his best, bluff soldier that he was, to make himself agreeable. When he took his tour around the world, she was with him. When he went to Mount McGregor to die, the same faithful, tender friend was by his side. She was never out of reach of his call once during those sad days of waiting; she would not even leave the cottage long enough to go with her children to their meals at the hotel. Speechless, his eyes closed, apparently insensible to all sights and sounds, he turned his weary head in his last moments, toward where she was standing. Their hands were clasped when he crossed the river, over which she has passed to meet him.

GENERAL AND MRS. GRANT AND THEIR CHILDREN AT MOUNT MCGREGOR

KINDLY LIGHT

By FLORENCE M. KINGSLEY

SUMMARY OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENT

Luelly Bidwell has been making a home for her husband's widowed mother, old Mrs. Bidwell; but, though very well intentioned, she has never quite understood the old lady, and, least of all, sympathized with her harmless delusion that her husband is still alive; that she is merely paying a visit to her step-daughter, and that her husband is waiting for her return to the old home. One evening, old Mrs. Bidwell leaves the house unnoticed and makes her way to the farm, now occupied by new tenants, where she quite believes she is expected.

N the farm-house kitchen Amelia Holcomb was busy preparing supper. She was a pretty girl, with cheerful pink cheeks and yellow-brown hair. As she moved lightly about, she glanced now and again from the clock to the bright-burning candle by the window.

"When daddy sees it, he'll know supper is most ready, and hurry up the horses," she said to herself.

And now the biscuits were coaxed to a golden finish, the tea-kettle bubbled merrily, and the delicately browned slices of salt-pork sizzled in the skillet. The girl listened anxiously for the sound of wheels; then she threw wide the door and stood silhouetted, slim and graceful, against the glowing interior of the comfortable old room. A smothered cry broke from the darkness close at hand, and a bedraggled little figure tottered toward her with outstretched hands. "Oh, I'm so glad to get home!"

"I don't know who she is, daddy," said Amelia Holcomb half an hour later. "But she was so wet and tired and cold that I let her come in, and gave her some tea. She's asleep on the sitting-room lounge now. She seemed so pleased and grateful, poor old lady!"

Farmer Holcomb stooped over the sleeping form, candle in hand, a puzzled look on his broad, good-natured face. "Sho!" he exclaimed at last, as light broke suddenly upon his cogitations. "I know who 'tis, daughter; it's ol' Ma'am Bidwell. She went to live with her son after the ol' man died. I reckon she got kind of homesick an' thought she'd come an' take a look at the farm. I'll hitch an' let Bidwell's folks know after supper; I don't b'lieve they suspicion where she is."

As the young girl sat by the couch where her guest lay, still wrapped in the heavy sleep of exhaustion, her blue eyes wandered about the homely room. The old-fashioned patch-work and crocheted tidies which covered the Boston rocker, the braided rugs that lay before hearth and sofa, the curious hair wreath in its glass case, the "everlastin's" and crystalized grasses in the china vase, the blossoming geraniums on the window-sill, all were undisturbed since the day the Holcombs had moved into the Bidwell farmhouse. "It's home just as it is," she had said briefly, and her father had agreed with her.

The gentle old face on the chintz pillow wore the satisfied look of a tired child who sleeps at last on its mother's breast. As Amelia Holcomb glanced at it thoughtfully, she remembered the keen gray eyes and tightly-compressed lips of young Mrs. Bidwell.

"I should think she would be homesick," she said aloud, recalling her father's words. "I've been dreadfully lonesome since mother died; why couldn't she stay with us for awhile. Father wouldn't mind sleeping upstairs; I know she had that little back bedroom off the sitting-room; it's just as she left it."

An hour later the sound of wheels, and her father's loud, hearty voice as he called to his tired horses, brought her to the door. The pink in her round cheeks had deepened to crimson, and her blue eyes shone with a half-frightened, half-defiant light.

Young Mrs. Bidwell was shaking a shower of hard, round snowflakes from the folds of a thick gray shawl as she stepped briskly into the kitchen; her tones were loud and crisp as she turned to assure Farmer Holcomb that she wouldn't keep him waiting a minute.

"I'll jus' wrap mother up in this 'ere blanket-shawl," she said, turning to address the girl. "The land knows I hope she won't be laid up on my han's! I don't see how in the created world she ever come to think of cuttin' up such a dido. I tell John I'll see 'at her window is kep' nailed down good an' tight after this. I ain't a-goin' to have her traipsin' round the country ketchin' her death in the wet."

"I've put her to bed," said Amelia Holcomb firmly. "I want her to stay here."

Mrs. Bidwell dropped the shawl in her amazement. "You've put her to bed!" she exclaimed. "You want she should stay here! Well, I guess not. Folks 'ud say I don't treat her right; an' they can't nobody say that about me! If I haven't done my duty by John Bidwell's mother instant, pouring forth her suddenly formed plans into his attentive ear in a whisper.

"Lonesome—eh!" he exclaimed, his ruddy face growing sober. "Wall, I s'pose you be—poor little gal! Course—course; let her visit ye for a spell. Do her good—do ye both good. You needn't to worry 'bout the ol' lady, Mis' Bidwell; 'Melie c'n look arter her all right. She's an awful good han' to make folks comf'table, my 'Melie is."

"I dunno as I'd care, if it wa'n't for what folks 'ud say," began Mrs. Bidwell reluctantly. "There's my house-cleanin' nex' week; I don't know how in creation I c'd ever get through with it, with Mother Bidwell upsettin' ev'rythin' the hull endurin' time."

"Sho!" cried Farmer Holcomb. "Who's good long visit, if it's so your ma kin spare you."

At breakfast time Farmer Holcomb was somewhat mistily placed as "Tom, my second cousin's son by her first husband." But he was made none the less welcome to that hospitable board. Indeed, Ol' Ma'am Bidwell urged him to "stay right along, an' help father with his spring chores." And he gravely consented.

"We c'n humor her, I guess, whilst she's here, an' let her do 'bout as she takes a notion," said the good man to his daughter, as the old lady began briskly to gather up the breakfast things. "Twont be fer long, fer we can't expect to keep her from her own folks."

Ol' Ma'am Bidwell's visit wasn't a long one; but Amelia Holcomb was glad to the last day of her life when she looked back to it. The tiny bent figure hurried hither and yon about the dearly-remembered rooms. Father was absent, she explained; gone over to "Th' Forks" to buy stock. "I mus' get ev'rythin' ready for Sunday 'fore he comes back," she said. "Me an' father likes to have it quiet an' peaceful on Sundays. It's mos' like heaven in the settin' room when the sun shines through the g'raniums, an' father reads 'bout the many mansions. He's a great han' to read the Gospel, father is."

So the old house was swept and garnished, Amelia's strong young hands working swiftly and skilfully beside the feeble ones. Father's favorite pudding was set to cool on the pantry shelf, and a jar of old-fashioned molasses cookies stood in its wonted corner.

"I'm reel tired," sighed the old lady happily; but ev'rythin's ready, an' I'm glad, for father's on his way now; he'll not be long."

The red light of the setting sun, pleasantly interrupted by the geranium leaves, streamed in through the clear windows and touched the little figure resting in the Boston rocker, with its patchwork cushions and crocheted tidies. After a time the wrinkled eyelids closed, and Amelia Holcomb stole quietly away to set the tea-table.

She sang softly as she moved about her work, and the winding melody of the sweet old tune blent with the dream that was near its awakening in the darkening room beyond.

So long thy power hath blessed me, sure it still Will lead me on, o'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone; and with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

The words trembled into silence as the girl paused beside the motionless figure in the rocking-chair.

Ol' Ma'am Bidwell's eyes were wide and bright with a joyful surprise. "John! Why, John!" she cried. Then she turned to the girl with a happy little laugh. "Tell Luelly 'at father's come for me, an' I'm a-goin' home!"

—what with waitin' on her, han' an' foot, an' her settin' comf'table by the fire, an' —"

"I only meant for a visit," interrupted the girl, hastily. "I'm lonesome out here, and I thought you wouldn't mind if she stayed a little while. She was pretty wet. I took off her clothes, and— and— she's in her own bed asleep now."

"I s'pose I c'd let her stay till to-morrow," said Mrs. Bidwell stiffly. "Only I don't see how I c'd leave my work to come after her again." There was a touch of suspicious anger in the glance she bestowed upon the girl's glowing face. "I s'pose she was complainin' as usual. She's awful onreasonable an' set in her ways, Mother Bidwell is; an' she ain't right in her mind either. I don't b'lieve you c'd get along with her nohow. I've had to watch her every minit."

"She was homesick," said Amelia Holcomb briefly.

Mrs. Bidwell sniffed contemptuously. "Homesick," she repeated. "The simple idee! Well, I can't be keepin' your pa waitin' all night. I guess you'll fin' he won't want to be bothered with her." She turned to the farmer, whose broad figure had appeared in the open door.

Amelia was at her father's side in an a-goin' to say anythin'. This 'ere is her prop'ty, ain't it? She's come out to look arter it fer a spell, that's all."

When Amelia Holcomb came down to the kitchen the next morning in the pink light of dawn, she found Ol' Ma'am Bidwell inspecting her geraniums. "They look reel han'some," the old lady was saying to herself, as her tremulous fingers brushed the aromatic leaves. "My! if it don't seem good to scent 'em agin! Luelly never would have no house-plants; she says they make sech a muss. But as I tell father 'tain't like home without flowers. He likes 'em, father doos, mos' as well as I do."

She turned to meet the girl's blue eyes. "Why, you stayed all night, didn't you?" she exclaimed. "I'm reel glad 'twas so you could. I like young folks, an' so does father. But someway I can't rightly remember you—nless," she added eagerly, "you're my Sarah's darter 'Melie?"

"That's my name—'Melie," said the girl, showing her white teeth in a pleasant smile. She could not know that "Sarah" had lain in the churchyard for more than twenty years, her daughter by her side.

"You've growed wonderful, deary, sence I seen you," chirruped the old lady. "I do hope you kin stay an' make me a

The Saloon in the Capitol

AMONG the Washington despatches of recent date is an item that received from the daily press scarcely so much notice as it deserved. It was to the effect that Congress had decided that henceforth no intoxicating liquor should be sold in the Capitol. For some time past, intoxicants have been excluded from the restaurant at the Senate side of the building; but in the House restaurant they are openly sold across the bar. A clause has been inserted from year to year in the Immigration Bill forbidding the sale, but every year that clause has been thrown out in the Senate. This year, however, the Bill was passed intact, and the clause excluding liquor from the Capitol stands part of the Bill.

We sincerely congratulate our legislators on the decision. Of course, we would not imply that there was any danger to them in the sale of liquor under the roof of the Capitol. We naturally expect that men who have been elected members of an assembly governing this great nation, would have too high a sense of the dignity of their position to yield to the allurements of the intoxicating cup. But the existence of a bar-room in connection with the federal legislature was incongruous. It set a bad example. The traffic is so disastrous to the nation; it is so prolific in misery, ruin and crime, that it was an outrage to have it flaunting its face in the very centre of national authority. We are devoutly thankful that the death knell of its existence in those sacred precincts has been rung, and most earnestly pray that this act may be the beginning of its downfall elsewhere, and that the time may speedily come when the ruthless enemy of our national greatness may be excluded, not alone from the Capitol, but from every city and home in our land.

Good and Bad Amusements

IT is a question of the widest human interest which is discussed by THE MAIL-BAG contributors to-day. To draw the broad line of demarcation between proper and improper amusements, between good and bad social diversions, is a task by no means easy, and the wide variety of opinion expressed by the contributors to the symposium only serves to emphasize the fact that, on such a subject, hardly any two persons can be found who think precisely alike.

Here is a young man of Christian character, of fair education and abilities, and with the natural love of youth for social companionship. Just beginning a business or professional career, he finds, in occasional contact with society, a form of relaxation which refreshes without dissipation, and which gives to life the variety and interest and healthful excitement that seem to be needed to prevent it from becoming monotonous. He finds that contact with these kindly influences is helpful and strengthening, and that an hour or two of pleasant social intercourse is time well spent. He discovers, too, that there are two kinds of society—the good and the bad—and that there are, fortunately, many persons who, like himself, do not believe that a clean, honorable, Christian life should be a barrier to all enjoyment, or condemn one to a gloomy, morbid, unsocial existence, in which mirth is forbidden and laughter is sin. He finds it quite possible to pass delightful evenings, in music and song and the enjoyment of good company, without the sensuous exhilaration of the dance, or the drinking or card-playing that are characteristic of the other kind of society. He learns too, that receptions, teas, concerts, and gatherings of various kinds may be attended, in moderation.

And right here, consecrated common sense interposes and indicates where the line shall be drawn. It should be drawn not only at all diversions that have the slightest suggestion of impropriety, but also at over-indulgence in diversions that are innocent enough in themselves, but which, in excess, are prejudicial to health. One can have too much of many things which, taken in reasonable quantities, would be highly beneficial. Even the best of our social pleasures should be enjoyed in moderation. But the line is firmly and indelibly drawn at those pleasures that cannot be indulged without detriment to Christian character, or to personal health, and which are simply a foolish and wicked waste of precious time. The social "pull" that is obtained through such pleasures is a pull downward—never upward. Probably no young man ever found his career advanced, or his personal character or reputation improved by the fact that he was an expert at cards, or at betting on the turf, or at a drinking bout, or because he was a "jolly good fellow."

It is pitiful to see men and women so absorbed with eagerness to secure this or that fleeting pleasure or possession. If you have read Geo. William Curtis' delightful book, Prue and I, you will recall the chapter about Mr. Titbottom's spectacles. The magical quality of these spectacles was that when their owner looked through them he ceased to see persons as they ordinarily appeared on the street; he saw their real essential character personified. Wonderful were the revelations that were made. He looked at one man and saw nothing but a ledger. Another was simply a billiard cue; another a jockey cap; another a pack of cards. If he had looked in these days, another would have been a whiskey flask, a dancing manikin, or a tailor's model. If he had looked at women, one might have been a fashion-plate, another a stage doll, and so on.

The parable is easily read. How many people there are whose whole existence is so narrowed down to the enjoyment of worldly pleasures that their souls are shrivelled up within them. Such is the experience of those who, forgetting the higher aims of existence, wholly yield themselves up to social diversions and allurements, until, having lost all power of discrimination, they are swept along in the current to finally plunge into the abyss of wasted lives.

Senator Burton's Denial

UNITED STATES Senator Joseph R. Burton, of Kansas, we are glad to note, has seen fit to make an explanation, through the Washington Star, of his recent utterances concerning the American missionaries in Hawaii. It will be remembered that some of the leading secular newspapers, in referring to the Senator's attitude after his return from Hawaii, attributed to him the extraordinary statement that "the Hawaiians had been robbed by missionaries from Boston and elsewhere, who, in exchange for their lands, gave them certificates that they would go to heaven when they died."

That such a remark could have been made by a Senator of the United States, officially or otherwise, seemed to us incredible. We communicated with the missionaries in Hawaii, and from them received letters in which the writers expressed the belief that the Senator had probably been misquoted or misunderstood. Even in the worst aspect of the case, they believe that he had somehow been imposed upon.

Now, however, Senator Burton himself removes the imputation from the missionaries, by a general denial that he ever made any statement reflecting upon them. He adds:

This statement about missionaries trading certificates to heaven for land, which is attributed to me, is sometimes told in Hawaii as a joke, but it does not refer to the early missionaries. . . . I do not remember ever to have said anything that could be interpreted like the statement contained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, even in relation to the missionary party; I positively know I have never said anything that reflected in any way upon the Christian missionaries.

The episode, as far as Senator Burton is concerned, ends here. His denial is sufficient. But the incident shows how indiscreet and jocular remarks may be misconstrued and have a disagreeable recoil. This "joke," whoever launched it here, was in bad taste, and proved a boomerang, with a return swing reaching all the way back from Hawaii.

Ordered Steps

THE teaching of the Word is that God orders, arranges, establishes, not merely the life at large, but all the details of the life of every one of his children.

You have stood some evening in some great railway station where you could look down upon the trains arriving and departing every few moments, and you wondered, perhaps, at the quiet and confidence of an engineer as his engine rolled out into the darkness through a labyrinth of rails and crossings. But a moment's reflection showed you why he was not disturbed by the gloom and apparent confusion before him. It was simply because everything was laid down for him. He had only to obey his signal and drive his engine; the track was laid. The care of the switches and signal lights was for others, not for him. His part was only to go forward and to stop when bidden.

But some one perhaps will say, "I do not like that picture. It takes away my independence, my freedom of will. It leaves me little to say about my own life." Well, suppose you change the picture? Suppose the train goes out of the station without any established schedule, any prearrangement of time and track by which it shall proceed. Have you bettered the case? Is a man any better, more dignified or more secure striking out into this world on his own responsibility, and with only his own wisdom? What is the meaning of the wrecks innumerable that we encounter on every hand as we make our way through life, but that men have wilfully, daringly, disregarded the heavenly signals and sped away on the tracks of their individual choice. A man's own wisdom, or reason, or knowledge, a man's own natural impulses, or inward light, as against the ordering of his steps by the good counsel of the Lord is no better than the frenzy of a madman. There are no wrecks along the lines on which God orders the steps.

GEMS FROM TALMAGE

Social Anomalies

—MIND THIS: God never undertook a failure. The Old Book, which is worth all other books put together, makes it plain that God has undertaken to regulate this world by Gospel influences, and if he has the power he will do what he says he will, and no one who amounts to anything will deny his power. God has said a hundred times "I will," but never once has said "I cannot." We may with our tack-hammers pound away, trying to mend and improve and straighten the financial condition of the world, and be disappointed in the result, because our arm is too weak and the hammer we wield too small; but the most defiant difficulty will flatten and disappear when God, with a hammer made of summer thunderbolts, strikes it, saying, "The crooked shall be made straight."

Contrasted Natures

—CONTRASTS ARE mighty. The artist, in sketching the field of Waterloo, years after the battle, put a dove in the mouth of the cannon. Raphael, in one of his cartoons, beside the face of a wretch put the face of a happy and innocent child. The sour face of the irascible and disgusted elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son is brought out in order that in the contrast we might better understand the forgiving and the radiant face of God. It all means that God is ready to take back anybody who is sorry, to take him clear back, to take him back forever and forever and forever; to take him back with a loving hug, to put a kiss on his parched lip, a ring on his bloated hand, an easy shoe on his chafed foot, a garland on his bleeding temples, and heaven in his soul. I flat on that mercy. Come, my brother, and let us get down into the dust, resolved never to rise until the Father's forgiving hand shall lift us.

The Spirit of the Flowers

—YOU SAY THESE flowers will fade. Yes, but perhaps we may see them again. They may be immortal. The fragrance of the flower may be the spirit of the flower; the body of the flower dying on earth, its spirit may appear in better worlds. I do not say it will be so. I say it may be so. The ancestors of these tuberose and camelias and japonicas and jasmynes and heliotropes were born in Paradise. These apostles of beauty came down in the regular line of apostolic succession. Their ancestors, during the flood under ground, afterward appeared. The world started with Eden, it will end with Eden. Heaven is called a Paradise of God. Paradise means flowers. While theological geniuses in this day are trying to blot out everything material from their idea of heaven, and, so far as I can tell, their future state is to be a floating around somewhere near the Great Bear, I should not be surprised if at last I can pick up a daisy on the everlasting hills and hear it say, "I am one of the glorified flowers of earth. Do you not remember me? I worshiped with you one Easter morning on earth."

"A Lover of Animals"

The "Family Art Gallery" is a beauty. The "Evening Anthem" is the loveliest of the set of ten pictures, but "Lost Sheep" makes the deepest impression upon me, as I am a great lover of animals. I am surprised that you can send such handsome pictures free to every subscriber. I consider the set as a Christmas gift from you. S. C. JONES.

Venezuela's Trouble

ITH more than the usual South American capacity for stirring up trouble, Venezuela, torn by civil war, and embroiled with its neighbors, has now added to its national miseries a dispute with Germany and Great Britain, that has become acute. For several years Venezuela has been a persistent borrower from the two Powers. It has needed money for the use of the government and it needed the construction of several lines of railroad. It borrowed the former directly and it guaranteed the payment for the latter. Though about six years have passed since the indebtedness was contracted, there has been no payment on account of either interest or principal. When pressed to meet the obligations of his government, President Castro is reported to have taken an attitude of defiance. Remembering how President Cleveland championed his cause, in the boundary dispute with Great Britain, Castro is said to have replied to the demands of the two Powers with the taunt that they dare not proceed against him, because he was under the protection of the United States. The reply exasperated the two governments, and they determined to test the extent of that protection. Having explained their grievances to our government, and having received assurance that no protection would be given to Venezuela in an attempt to repudiate its financial obligations, Germany and Great Britain, acting together, sent a formidable squadron of warships to La Guayra, the port of Caracas, bearing an ultimatum to President Castro. He was required to pay, or make satisfactory arrangements for paying, such debts as were due and the arrears of interest which were long overdue. Even then, Castro pursued a policy of evasion, and allowed the time granted in the ultimatum to expire without a definite promise to fulfil his obligations. Thereupon the allied Powers seized four vessels belonging to the Venezuelan navy, three of which were taken outside the harbor and sunk. Castro issued a proclamation calling the nation to arms to resist the two Powers, and arrested all British and German residents in Caracas. Through the good offices of Mr. Bowen, our Minister to Venezuela, to whom the Ministers of Germany and Great Britain confided the interests of their respective governments when they left Caracas, the prisoners were subsequently released. Castro, however, seized a British ship which was discharging its cargo at Puerto Cabello, and, owing to a breakdown of its machinery, could not get away. It is supposed that the next step of the Powers will be to seize the custom-houses and hold them until they have collected sufficient duties to discharge their claims. It is inferred from the inaction of our government that it has received assurances from the allied Powers that permanent occupation of any part of Venezuela is not contemplated. Any such attempt would be regarded as an infraction of the Monroe Doctrine and would call for our intervention. All that the Monroe doctrine demands is that no European Power shall acquire American soil that it does not at present possess. It does not require us to interpose to prevent a European Power administering punishment to a Central or South American Power, or to prevent it enforcing its pecuniary claims. President Castro did not appear to understand this limitation. Apparently he has now realized it, for he has asked Minister Bowen to appeal to the Powers for the submission of the dispute to arbitration. It is a pity that he should have allowed the trouble to proceed so far, before making the request, for now it may be too late. For rulers as for individuals Christ's injunction is useful:

Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him (Matt. 5: 25.)

The Late Ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed

A figure, prominent in political life for many years passed away, when, on December 7, Thomas Brackett Reed breathed his last. From 1876 to 1899, he represented his native State in Congress, and in three Congresses he had been Speaker of the House. The fact speaks volumes for his ability, his energy and his mental force, for there had been nothing in his birth or environment to help him to so eminent a station. His family, though ancient, was not wealthy, and when at the close of his school course in Portland, Me., he determined to go to college, it was necessary for him to teach school in order to provide the necessary funds. He wanted to be a Congregational minister, but during his course at Bowdoin, he changed his mind and turned to the law. He continued to teach school after his graduation, but at every opportunity he studied legal books. During the War he entered the Navy, and became Acting-the House, he was elected. He had naturally an autocratic temper, which in this office exasperated his opponents, and won for him the name of the "Czar." When the House once more became Democratic, he was the leader of the minority and displayed wonderful skill in the management of his forces. In 1899, to the surprise of the whole country, he resigned, and removed to New York, where he became head of a legal firm. A man of remarkable force, he was thoroughly honest and sincere, a man as cordially admired by his friends, as he was heartily hated by his foes. His distinguishing characteristic was the unflinching, imperturbable courage with which he carried out the principles of his political creed, unmoved by opposition or denunciation. If Christians were as steadfast in obeying the principles of their faith, which God himself has established, as Mr. Reed was in loyalty to his political principles which are a legitimate subject for debate, it would be better for them and for the world.

Therefore my beloved brethren be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord (I. Cor. 15: 58).

Protracted Litigation

A remarkable lawsuit, which has been ten years in the courts, was decided in the Circuit Court at Jersey City, N. J., last week. It arose over the movement of a house. In 1876, the land on which the house was built was a meadow, on the edge of a swamp. In order to get a foundation the swamp part was filled in. The lots on each side were vacant. In 1892, the owner of one of the adjoining lots proposed to build on it, but when measurements were taken, it was found that the house already built had encroached upon it. The surveyors said that the filling under it had settled, causing the house to slide about fourteen inches. The owner of the vacant lot promptly brought suit against the owner of the house. The suit was tried three times, and each time the verdict was set aside. When it was called for the fourth time last week, it was stated that since the last hearing death had taken the plaintiff, the defendant, the judge in whose court it was entered and several of the witnesses. The heirs are doubtless glad that the case is settled at last. To the original parties to the suit the result is now of no importance. The question that concerns them is whether they have a title to an inheritance in heaven through the atonement of Christ.

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (II Cor. 5: 1).

THE BORROWED CHRISTMAS

By ANNIE GREEN LANDER

IT WAS the day before Christmas, and the first snow was falling, in slow, steady flakes, promising the "white" Christmas, so dear to young and old.

In the suburbs of the city the cemetery lay, and here the soft flakes seemed to fall with a peculiar tenderness. Through the deepening snow two children struggled to the corner where the poor were buried.

"There it is, Mollie!" the boy cried. "And the snow is the highest of all on mother's grave!" Mollie smiled proudly.

"So it is, Tommy! And just look at the evergreen tree—all over snow. It's like a great big monnyment. I think it's grander to have a big tree for a monnyment than a stone; don't you, Tommy?"

"Sure; and the stone couldn't talk to us for mother, like the tree does; could it, Mollie?"

"No, I guess not. Wasn't it lucky that we found out mother could make the tree answer us?"

Tommy nodded assent. "Where shall we put the ferns and things?"

"Right here," said Mollie; and they planted the branches of dogwood berries stiffly in the snow, and stuck the stems of the "Christmas ferns" firmly about them.

"That looks good, don't it?" said Mollie. "Them red berries look real elegant against the white snow! Dear, how the wind blows! Come, Tommy, we must go; but we'll come to-morrow and sing the song, you know. Now let's speak to Mother. Put your hands together, Tommy, like you do in 'Now I lay me.' Now—Mother, we've left your Christmas presents. We hope the snow don't make you cold. Good-bye, mother dear. Did you hear us?"

The two children—their innocent faces awed with their communion with the dead mother—fixed their eyes on an old bough sweeping the grave, and waited breathlessly. Suddenly a little gust of wind swayed the limb.

"She answered, Mollie! Oh, she answered!" Tommy cried. But Mollie only smiled contentedly, her blue eyes a little dim as she drew Tommy away.

The two children trudged through the snow, unbroken save for the tread of a lonely rabbit which scampered across their path. The snow was less dry now, and was clinging to their frail little wraps.

"Oh, Moll! look at the new graves! just looker here, will you?"

The children paused in surprise by two little graves, less than a month old. To-day there was something new to note, for between the two tiny mounds stood a glass case filled with toys and books.

Mollie gasped as her quick eyes ran over the delightful contents of the wonderful box.

"Did you ever! I never heard of such a thing before. These things most likely belong to the little girl and boy that was buried here. Oh, Tommy, will you look at that doll?"

"Mollie, see this engine! Oh, my, do you think it's the kind to go without a-pulling her?"

"Tommy Jones, I bet you that doll can say 'mommer' when you squeeze her. I bet you she can."

The two children admired and exclaimed, forgetting the cold and the gathering darkness. "Aint it a queer idea, though? You don't suppose those little dead children play with the things, do you?"

Mollie shook her head. "No, I guess not. Oh, I wish we had 'em to play with."

"Oh, Mollie, look! I can git the cover off." Tommy, his eyes bulging with excitement, pushed off the snow, and in a minute had raised the lid and seized the engine. Mollie was no slower, though she handed the doll with care.

It was several minutes before Mollie stopped Tommy's chatter. "We must put 'em back now, and hurry home."

"Can't we take 'em home, just for to-night? Nobody would know, and you said the children down there don't play with 'em. Oh, Mollie, can't we?"

Mollie grew pale as the magnitude of Tommy's suggestion dawned upon her. "Oh, Tommy, no. We dassen't do it."

"Nobody'll know, I tell you. We'll take 'em home now and bring 'em back in the morning. I do so want to set this engine going on the garret floor. Oh, please!"

Tommy paused for breath. Mollie was clasping the doll.

"You'd like that doll baby in bed with you, wouldn't you?" the shrewd Tommy urged.

"Oh, I wonder if it'll be wrong!"

"I'll tell you, Mollie; I'll ask mother. If she says we can, it'll be all right, won't it?"

relented, and was nodding her permission? The poor child did not notice that a brisk little breeze was not only swaying mother's tree, but was also busily stirring all the trees about her. She mistook the gentle motion for the desired permission, and a happy smile broke through the tears.

"Then it is all right, mother! and we'll bring 'em back early, sure. Oh, mother, just listen till you hear the lovely lady-doll talk," and Mollie gave her precious burden a vigorous, though tender, squeeze. "Did you hear, mother? Wasn't it real! Good-bye, mother dear."

The cold, dark garret in the house in the valley had never before known such joy as it held that night. Perhaps the joy was all the sweeter because of the need of secrecy. Tommy stealthily ran the engine up and down the strip of had come to spend a half hour this Christmas morning by the little white mounds.

One glance was sufficient to show them the little toys were gone. The next moment, glancing over the hedge, Mr. and Mrs. Brown perceived two children trudging along, each clasping something. The boy was crying heartily, and the girl wore a frightened, dazed look.

Mr. Brown called to the children, but his voice was drowned by the boy's sobs. So, followed by his wife, he strode after the children, who paused by a stoneless grave. They fell on their knees beside it, and the boy's sobs were hushed as his sister's voice, full of misery, burst forth—

"Oh, mother! mother! what'll we do? We've broke the engine, and the lady-doll won't say 'mommer' when I squeeze her. We didn't go for to do it, and we meant to bring 'em back all safe this morning."

"I done it! I done 'em both, mother!" cried the boy, grinding his dirty little knuckles into his eyes. "I dropped the engine and her chimbley come off; and I was just trying to hear the doll talk when I busted her. What'll they do to us, mother? They won't kill us, will they, mother? Oh, Mollie, suppose the tree says 'yes' for mother?"

"It won't, Tommy, it won't," Mollie hurriedly answered. "But, mother, will we have to go to prison? We were going to take such good care of them and bring them back early this morning. We didn't think the little dead children would care. Oh, mother, will we have to go to prison?"

Oh, the agony, the misery, in that little face turned toward the creaking bough! Tommy sniveled by his sister's side, occasionally giving the machinery of the engine a furtive turn. Mr. Brown started forward.

"Don't cry, dear!" he exclaimed, with as much pain in his voice as though it had been his own little maid in trouble. He caught Mollie in his arms, and, though she was frightened by this sudden appearance of a strange man and lady, the kind faces reassured her. "Don't be frightened. No one is going to send you to prison. Don't cry, little woman."

Mollie looked in bewilderment from the kind face above her to the beautiful lady.

"But we took these things, and we've broke them. We meant to bring 'em back early, and we didn't mean to hurt them. Mother said we could take them, sir."

"Is this your mother's grave?"

"Yes, sir. Isn't it a beautiful grave, with the snow all over it?" Mollie asked, her pride struggling through her misery. "And the tree—it's mother's monnyment, you know—the tree talks to us for her."

Then they questioned the children, until the whole story was told, and Mr. and Mrs. Brown were looking with tender eyes on the narrow, unnamed grave.

"Oh, Walter," cried the lady, "can't we take these children home to dinner with us? There, Mollie, the doll is yours to keep. And you shall have another that will say—oh, ever so many words. Walter, isn't she like Margaret? and the boy—he must be only a little older than Arthur. Come, children, let us go to the sleigh."

Mollie and Tommy were in a high state of bewilderment and glee, but as they were turning away, Mollie drew Tommy back to the old tree.

"We must say good-bye first, you know, and sing the song, like we promised."

Mr. Brown clasped his wife's hand, and they bowed their heads for Mollie's prayer.

"Mother, dear, it's all right. The lady and gentleman says so. And we're not going to prison, but we're going home with them; and, oh, mother! the lady says we'll have turkey! and the gentleman says the little dead children wants us to keep the things. Good-bye, mother, dear. We'll sing the song now."

And with music in their hearts, and in rhythm with the gentle motion of the bough, the children sang in trembling, high-pitched voices:

"Peace on earth, good-will to men."

"TWO CHILDREN TRUDGING ALONG, EACH CLASPING SOMETHING"

The little girl looked relieved. "Well, maybe. But I'd rather ask her, Tommy."

Cramped with the cold, Mollie stumbled along, doing her best to shield the great doll under the old shawl. The little upturned face was very earnest as she petitioned by her mother's grave.

"Mother, can we take the things home? We'll bring them back in the morning, when we come to sing. Can we, dear?"

Not a leaf on the old tree stirred! Poor little Mollie! The slow tears rolled down her cheeks, and a great lump rose in her throat. She waited, a long time it seemed to her; then she clasped the precious doll against her warm, little mother heart, and turned forlornly away.

Just before she passed out of sight, Mollie looked back at the old tree, and a little appealing whisper, "Oh, mother!" escaped her. She stopped and shook the tears from her startled eyes.

The bough was nodding! What did it mean? Mother had not answered; but could it be that she had carpet by the bed, while Mollie dressed and undressed the doll, and fell in pathetic little attitudes of worship above her.

The wind swept round the eaves and into the cracks, making the bit of candle sputter and flare, and chilling the children until they were glad to creep into bed, where they fell asleep to dream of the treasures clasped in their arms.

Christmas morning dawned clear and cold. Over the snowy roads a sleigh was gliding toward the cemetery. The horses were stopped within the gates, and a man and woman alighted, and followed the narrow little path which wound in and out among the graves, until they reached two little mounds on the sunny slope of the hill.

It was the saddest and loneliest Christmas these people had ever known, but it had pleased the grieving mother to plan a little box of Christmas gifts and have it placed between her children's graves. The work had been completed only two days previous, and the father and mother HINK of a home where Christmas finds an empty larder, little stockings unfilled, childish hope and faith shaken, childish hearts sad; and then of motherhood standing empty-handed before pleading childhood on this day of days. Perhaps father has died since last Christmas; perhaps he is ill in the hospital; perhaps, alas, strong drink has mastered him; perhaps he has deserted mother and them. It has been all mother could do to keep the wolf from the door.

Christmas Eve finds her with no pennies to spend for toys and goodies, hardly enough to purchase one scanty meal for to-morrow. Christmas morning comes. She has done her best. Everything is as tidy and cheerful as she can make it. A bright fire casts its warm glow over the room. Late last night a mysterious gift of coal was brought to her door, and her heart had overflowed with gratitude. But, oh, the empty stockings! How can she answer the children's questions, how soothe their disappointment? Santa Claus has forgotten.

A light rap at the door. She does not hear. It opens softly. God's messenger has come. A pleasant voice says: "A Merry Christmas to you! THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers send Christmas greetings, and hope you and the children will be their guests to-day and enjoy this nice turkey dinner. Here are toys and goodies for the children, and some good, warm garments. Good-bye. God bless you! We have other friends to visit. Yes, we will tell Dr. Klopsch and the readers of the paper that you pray for them and bless them. Good-bye."

"For the eleven years in which I have been working among the East Side poor," says Mrs. S. Bird, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has enabled me to carry the Lord's bounty into abodes of want and wretchedness. Thousands and thousands of homes, that were otherwise without Christmas cheer, have been filled with joy and gladness by that generous paper and its great-hearted readers. Let all our friends keep this thought by them to-morrow, that their own Christmas feast may be sweeter."

The eleven years to which Mrs. Bird refers have been spent in the neediest and most densely populated sections of the city. Only yesterday, the representative of this paper, while visiting the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," was told of a case where a family of ten were dependent for support upon the oldest sister, a girl of seventeen, making $5 a week. The father had deserted them; the mother was ill in bed. When the missionary worker called, there was not one mouthful to eat in the house. To hundreds of dwellings as needy and miserable as this, Mrs. Bird and her staff of assistants are ministers of relief. "To every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has helped us," says Mother Bird, "the East Side poor send Christmas greetings."

Mrs. Bird's Christmas Tree

"THE beautifullest tree that ever was," as the children will say of it, stands in the Old Bowery Mission, ready to shed its gifts on the morrow. It is the biggest tree that could be found in the New York market, and, though loaded from top to bottom with such fruit as Christmas trees bear, it cannot carry half the good things provided. There are more to be added in the morning. Mighty hampers overflowing with treasures will be placed around on the platform, which will bear a striking resemblance to a country store, because of the abundance and variety of its furnishings.

One purchase of 500 dolls was made for this tree. An addition of 200 followed, and still the dollies came, all in their brightest red, blue and pink gowns. Toy waggons and balls and trumpets and small sets of doll dishes keep the dolls company; 500 little boxes and bags of candy and oranges and apples and other things small folks like to eat will fall from the tree to-morrow into eager hands. Mittens, aprons, shoes, and other useful things may be found in the neighborhood of this extraordinary tree. Best of all in this season of scarcity of fuel, are the coal-tickets to be gathered from its wonderful branches. In some specially needy and deserving cases, where houses are known to be chill and bare, such fruit as this will drop from its boughs into little hands which may bear them joyfully home to mother; mother will show them to the coal-dealer and he will honor the order. Then, there will be a fire in the grate or the stove and folks may sit around in comfort Christmas night, and Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree to thank for it.

One of our mission men, an electrician, has arranged for the tree to be lighted by electricity. Balls and bulbs of fire will break out all over it when the switch is turned on; and at the very top, a large, beautiful white star will quiver in wonderful radiance—the "Star of Bethlehem." Tiny angels swing about in the branches.

Long before two o'clock to-morrow—the hour of invitation—children will be lined up for two blocks in front of the mission. When the doors open, the rush will be something indescribable. In anticipation, one hears now the chorus of delight breaking from the throng, when the tree, in all its beauty, flashes out before them.

Little girls and boys from attics and cellars, highways and by-ways are in the crowd. In rags and tags, with shawls over their heads, they come leading small brothers and sisters. At least 1,200 pack the hall. When they are seated, it will be seen that almost every child holds another in his or her lap.

There is a Christmas carol, and a prayer and a talk about the little Christ-Child, and Mother Bird tells them, too, of the kind friends whose goodness made their Christmas joy possible. "I do believe," she writes to this paper, "that the children think of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers as a separate race of human beings, living in a fairyland somewhere near heaven, where God puts dolls and toys in their hands so that poor children may have a Christmas Tree. And Dr. Klopsch is their sure-enough Santa Claus." How happy they are when the gifts are distributed. Mrs. Bird and Dr. Klopsch are so busy they hardly have time to breathe, handing down the treasures of the Tree to the little ones. "Take me wagon back," one wee lad will say bravely, "and gimme a doll for my little sick sister at home." He gets both. We have a long list of homes where there are cripples and sick children, who are faithfully remembered. Garments and useful gifts, and some things they can take home to "me mudder," are not lacking. The friends who have helped us load this Christmas Tree have helped to make over 1,200 homes happy to-morrow; every year they perform such act of grace. That is a glad thought for their Christmas!

"Lost in the Storm"

"Among so many good pictures as are found in the Family Art Gallery, it is hard to choose, but I think 'Lost in the Storm' the gem of the collection. It makes me think of other lost sheep, and of the Good Shepherd who so tenderly seeks them," writes Mary Baldwin, of Clifton Heights, Pa.

PAUL AND SILAS
AT PHILIPPI

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JAN. 4.
ACTS 16: 22-24

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—"BELIEVE ON THE LORD JESUS CHRIST, AND THOU SHALT BE SAVED, AND THY HOUSE." ACTS 16: 31

PAUL and Silas are in prison at Philippi, in the dungeon called the "inner prison." And, as if that were not enough to secure them, their feet are made fast in the stocks. Their strength is so depleted by scourging that they could hardly run away if they had a chance. Are they in prison for some crime? What is the charge? "These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city." It was a Roman city, and given over to idol worship and every form of wickedness. The name of Jesus could not be preached without "troubling" the wicked. And who were troubled? The shareholders in a girl who seemed to possess magic arts, sometimes called a "sybil." Paul and Silas had met this girl in the streets of Philippi, and had seen her plying her trade of deluding the people, who thronged about her, and from whom she gathered "gains" for her masters. Paul had seen that demons in her were the source of her power. In the name of Jesus, Paul had spoken to these demons and bade them come out of the girl. The demons had obeyed, and the girl's capacity for her evil trade was gone. The stock of her masters was at zero. No wonder they were "troubled," and imagined the whole city to be "troubled!" Doubtless there was some excitement, but it was because the power of God had conquered the powers of evil.

You can cage a bird, but you can not keep his song in bonds. The little bird stays just where you put him, because he can not escape, but his song goes all through the house, and out of the house and into the streets of the city. The prison of Philippi holds Paul and Silas, but their songs of praise go out of that inner prison into every other part of the prison, and out of the prison until they reach even to heaven itself and the ear of God. There is no minor note in the songs, which are songs of joy and praise. God not only holds the keys of death and hell, but of prisons on earth as well. There is no sound of a key in the lock, and the jailer's bunch of keys is undisturbed. But God opens the prison with an earthquake. And at the same time he holds the prisoners fast with an invisible key which no one can describe, for when the jailer rushes in, thinking that his prisoners have all escaped, and would therefore take his own life, knowing that he will be held accountable for them, Paul exclaims: "Do thyself no harm, for we are all here." And now it appears that another prisoner is to be released—the jailer himself—who is to become a free man in Christ Jesus. The bondage of sin loses its hold upon him when he kneels before Paul and Silas, and exclaims: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" And Paul and Silas answer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." And now the jailer, a free man indeed, set about to comfort Paul and Silas, by washing their stripes and by setting food before them in his own house. The graces of Christian sympathy and hospitality had a speedy growth in his heart. A Christian home is at once set up in a heathen prison.

Paul and Silas did not go out of prison when the doors were opened, not even when word was sent to them by the magistrate that they were free. They demanded that the magistrate should come in person and release them. Paul frightened that magistrate by declaring that he was a Roman citizen, and that he had been proceeded against unlawfully in being punished without a trial, and thus the magistrate was brought to the prison to apologize and set him free.

Illustration and Application

This story furnishes material for a whole series of lessons on the Christian life, from its beginning in saving faith to its widest expansion in the missionary spirit. For a class or home in which there are some unsaved, the time should be given wholly or chiefly to the first topic, that all such may begin the new year right with a new life; but in classes of Christians some or all of the other topics should have attention:

1. Personal Salvation—"Thou shalt be saved" (vv. 29-31.)
2. Family Religion—"And thy house" (vv. 31-33.)
3. Foreign Missions—"It was a heathen household."
4. City Missions—"The prisoners heard them."
5. The Power of Song—"It influenced God and men."
6. The Might of Right—"Prisons and lions' dens and fiery furnaces cannot stay the onward march of God's truth."

UPPER AND LOWER DUNGEONS

What is it to "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ?" It is more than to believe he was an historic character. Many infidels believe that. A child gave one of the best definitions: "Faith is grasping Christ with the heart." It is the grasp of one who feels he is in danger, that he cannot save himself, and that Christ is divinely able and willing to save. We have repeatedly presented faith as a bridge, but the bridge is needed again for any who have not used it. Saving faith is a bridge between sinful man and a merciful God, consisting of four arches: First, the arch of belief, built by the intellect; second, the arch of submission, built by the will; third, the arch of trust, built by the heart; fourth, the arch of faithfulness—of faith made full by application—built by the life.

Two Christian boys who had been skating in Central Park, New York, stopped to play, on their way home, in front of a small house. A man came out and said: "Boys, please be quiet, for there is a poor woman dying in this house." As the boys started to go away, one said to the other: "I wonder if she is ready. Let us go back and see." Back they went, but when they were about to ring the bell their courage failed, and they started to go away. Presently, they went back to see what they might do from the rear. Through a broken window they saw the sick woman on her cot, and one of the boys put his mouth to the window and shouted: "Sick woman, believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Then they ran away. Now this sick woman was a Christian, but was just then sorely tempted to believe she had been such a good-for-nothing, of no particular use to anybody, that she could not be saved. The words of the sweet-voiced boy, whom she could not see, she thought an angel message. God sent them just the same and just when she needed them. All her doubts were scattered, and death was robbed of all its terrors.

A pastor tells this story of a parishioner, who was a successful business man. "When on his death-bed, and I had been conversing with him one day, in presence of the man who had lately written his will, and who was not a Christian, I said: 'Mr. A., you have often expressed yourself to me thus confidently in reference to the future, but don't you sometimes have doubts or fears in reference to it?' Mark his reply. After a moment's delay, he quietly and meekly said: 'No, I don't; I don't see why I should have. I believe the

RUINS OF THE MARKET-PLACE AT PHILIPPI WHERE PAUL WAS SCOURGED

Bible is the Word of God. If it is, it can't fail; and it says: 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved.' Now, I believe on him; I trust him as my Saviour. Can there be any doubt about it then?" Having asked the question more for the benefit of our mutual friend, who was not yet a Christian, than anything else, I answered: 'You need not doubt; you need not distrust. Hold fast your belief. It's the faith that saves.' As we left together, our mutual friend said—'I never saw anything like it. Mr. A. is just as clear in spiritual as he always was in business matters.'

The golden text is not alone, or chiefly, for "trembling saints," but especially for the unsaved. Many a story could be told of those who have begun a Christian life, as the jailer did, with that sure promise. Here is one. A night train in England had made a brief stop for lunch. As the passengers hurried back to their seats, one exclaimed, with an oath: "It was too short!" A Christian man, who sat next to him, said:

"Have you ever thought that your time on earth may be short?" An earnest conversation followed, in which the promise was quoted: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." The profane man, to whom this command and promise of God was thus spoken, was a shipowner, who on the next day was looking about his ships at the docks, but those words seemed to be echoing in his ears wherever he turned. When he went to bed that night, he seemed to see those words on the walls of his room. He rose, and struck a light, and found the words in a Bible, and then, or later, he trusted himself to Christ, as one would put himself in the hands of a physician, and found the life that could make Paul and Silas joyous even in the stocks at midnight. What a lesson on joy could be made of that!

Another case yet more appropriate to illustrate our lesson, in which people who had relied on charms of the Sybil for help learned to turn to Christ himself in saving faith, is the story of a German Catholic woman, about to emigrate to America, who secured a crucifix as a charm against the dangers of the voyage and of the new land, as the custom is in such cases. She arrived in New York safely and thought this was due to her porcelain crucifix, which she put up on the walls of her room. But in dusting one day it fell and broke into a hundred fragments. She ran to another servant of her own race and cried, "What shall I do, for my dear Christ is all broken to pieces." This second German girl, to whom she turned for comfort, had given up such superstitions and learned a purer faith. She said, "Do not grieve, for I will tell you how to make up your loss. I keep my Saviour always in my heart." And so, by kindly explanations she taught the troubled girl to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as the only power by which she could be saved and safe.

But the promise of God does not stop with personal salvation. The Lesson Committee strangely put a period where God, speaking through Paul, put only a comma. God's promise unabridged is: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house." When Lydia came to Christ, she brought her whole household (v. 15). And so did this heathen jailer. Although the head of a household does not take his household with him almost as a matter of course to-day in such matters, it is still true, that when a father or mother, or even a son or daughter, is thoroughly converted, they can usually bring in all others of the household by the persuasion of a sincere Christian life, that proves its genuineness as conclusively as the jailer's did, whose natural cruelty was at once changed to sympathy and charity. The surest guarantee of a happy new year is a Christian household. We can bear almost anything if there is peace and love at home, and this cannot fail when the members of a family daily kneel together to seek forgiveness of God, which presupposes forgiveness of each other if any unpleasantness has occurred. If you have been saved, do as the healed demoniac did at Christ's word: "Go home to thy friends and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee. And he departed and began to publish."

The fact that this saved household was heathen makes this a missionary lesson—indeed, it is almost the greatest of missionary lessons, for this was the beginning of missions in then pagan Europe, whose idolatries are recalled as in a rosary in the days of the week. Surely we who are descendants of converted heathen can never slight the missionary cause!

There is food for profound thought in the fact that the places from which missionaries were then sent are the places to which they are now sent, reminding us that civilization tends to luxury, and luxury to vice, and vice to decay, which was shared even by churches planted by apostles in the then home mission fields of Palestine, Syria and Asia Minor.

Those who work in city missions may find cheer in this lesson in the listening prisoners to whom the apostles sang, and especially in the conversion of the jailer, who was probably like other Roman jailers, by nature brutally cruel. If such a man can be made gentle and hospitable, surely we need not despair of any of the coarse men with whom city missionaries have to deal. A man, who had been criminal and vicious, was seeking salvation, but feared he was too wicked to be saved.

"Look," said the city missionary, "at Christ as he hung between the two thieves, and say to him, 'O Christ, thou canst not save me.'" The man replied, "I dare not say that." "Then look up into his face and say, 'O Christ, thou wilt not save me.'" "No," said the man, "I dare not say that." "What will you say then?" The poor man saw the truth at once. He believed that Christ was both able and willing to save him there and then, and went on his way rejoicing.

The whole lesson time might well be spent in a class where there is musical talent, on the power of song as illustrated in this incident. Young Christians who can sing should be taught to make their words real musical oratory to persuade—not alone to please—by singing with (1) spiritual sympathy—heart as well as lips, (2) with clear enunciation, (3) with appropriateness, (4) with variety.

And what a triumphal march this lesson glimpses as it recalls that prisons and martyr fires have never been able to stay its course, for "the Word of God is not bound." God's earthquakes have checkmated man's stocks.

A Fireside Companion

"I do not understand how you can give us such an excellent paper and such a splendid Bible for only $3," writes a subscriber. "Your International Teachers' Bible would be cheap by itself at $5. And I think THE CHRISTIAN HERALD alone is worth that—in fact I would not take anything for my CHRISTIAN HERALD. We live in the country, and the paper is a blessed, cheerful, inspiring home companion for us all these long winter evenings. It is, too, the best educator in practical philanthropy that I know of. As for my Bible, with its many 'teachers' helps,' its excellent maps, and 'word book,' I do not know how I could teach my Sunday School class without its aid."

The International Teachers' Bible in soft, flexible leather, with overlapping edges, silk book-mark, durable leather lining, latest maps, fully illustrated helps, self-pronouncing, gilt-edged leaves, thumb-indexed, opening flat wherever you choose, is sent, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, for $3. Without leather lining and thumb index, the same book and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

Gospel Dawn in Europe

The Beginning of Missionary Work in a New Continent

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

MISSIONARY work began in Europe when Paul and his companions, Silas and Timothy, and probably Luke, arrived at Philippi, a port of Macedonia, and found a band of praying women prepared to receive the Word of God.

Up to this time, with the exception of Paul himself, who was formerly "a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious," the converts to the Gospel had been chiefly Jews or devout men, such as Cornelius, and those Gentile proselytes whose hearts were opened for the truth of God. But now Paul and Silas found themselves in a city where there was no synagogue, and the power of the Gospel upon hardened sinners, and those who where possessed of the devil must be manifested, that the Word of the Lord, "These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name they shall cast out devils" (Mark 16: 17), might be fulfilled. One sorcerer had been dealt with by Philip, but he had not been a satisfactory disciple (Acts 8: 9-24). Elymas the sorcerer had been struck blind by Paul (Acts 13: 6-12), but now God would show forth his power unto salvation for great sinners.

As they went to prayer, a poor girl, one of the spiritualist mediums of that day, by whose sooth-saying her masters (she was evidently a slave) enriched themselves, "followed after Paul and us, and cried out saying, These men are servants of the Most High God, which proclaim unto you the way of salvation." "And this she did many days." Paul was not in a hurry, he would not run before the Lord; but he "was sore troubled." He knew that a struggle was at hand, and he must be sure in his God how to act. God gave him liberty, and he said to the spirit, "I charge thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her." And it came out that very hour. It was like a declaration of war. Satan will be passive as long as the power of God is not openly manifest, but as soon as God appears in a power which cannot be gained, then Satan rages against his witnesses.

Her masters saw that no more money would be gained by them through the oracles of this once possessed girl: the devil had gone out of her, and their wicked ed business was ruined. They laid hold of Paul and Silas, dragged them into the marketplace before the rulers and magistrates, and charged them with troubling the city and breaking the laws. Alas for cities which are at peace in sin, which willingly harbor devils, but which hate God and righteousness!

Of course the multitude followed the rulers, when the rulers took the side against God. This is always so. The magistrates rent off their garments, and commanded them to be beaten. This was done, and they were cast into prison, the jailer, exceeding his orders, "cast them into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks." Paul was a Roman citizen, and this treatment was illegal. Why did he not at once remonstrate? God had given him another vocation. He must first show how Christ in a man can bear persecution. About midnight, Paul and Silas were praying and singing praises to God.

Christ came to teach us and put within us "newness of life" (Rom. 6: 4). It was "newness of life"—a life which had never before been known in Philippi, which rang out in the hymns of praise which proceeded from the men in prison, whose backs had been lacerated with the terrible Roman scourges. The prisoners woke up to hear; but while they were all awake, "suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison-house were shaken; and immediately all the doors were open, and every one's hands were loosed." An earthquake might cause the doors to open, but who undid the chains? An unseen hand was at work there. The jailer awoke, and in consternation beheld all his charges free. It was as much as his life was worth to be unable to produce them, and he was about to commit suicide rather than risk execution for failure of duty.

"The Evening Hymn"

I think the "Family Art Gallery" the finest reproductions I have ever seen. I like best of all the girl's head in the large oval—"The Evening Hymn." It is alone worth the subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The coloring of the dress and of the whole picture is exquisite. MRS. CATHERINE LONG. Fairfield, Ia.

CHRISTMAS IN THE OLD COLONIAL TIMES

PLYMOUTH'S first Christmas Day, Governor Bradford, as recorded in his famous log-book, called the people out to work, as usual. Most of the company excused themselves, on the ground that it was against conscience to toil on that day. The Governor said if it was a matter of conscience, he would excuse them until they were better informed. So, he and those who followed him, left them. On his return at noon, the Governor found them at play in the streets, some pitching the bar, some at stool-ball and like sports. He took away their implements, and told them it was against his conscience that they should play while others worked. It is said that a grim Puritan Governor reproved little children, whom he found gathering holly Christmas Day. Certain it is that New England's little folks had not nearly so merry a Christmas in early colonial days as now.

On week days, Sundays and holidays, small Puritans, as well as large ones, took life seriously. It was a terrible thing when a little maid smiled in church one Sabbath! When Deacon West's small grandson, walking with him to church, noticed a squirrel, he tweaked the child's ear and told him "squirrels were not to be spoken of on the Lord's Day!" Children were trained to strict habits of diligence. Little girls worked samplers, pieced quilts, spun flax, knit socks and stockings and comforters, wove tape, made lace, and did many other things. Little boys split pegs for shoes, set card-teeth, brought in fuel, fed swine and horses. Children were expected to be always willing and never tired.

They had few playthings, and most of these they manufactured for themselves. In 1743, there seems to have been but one toy store in this country. Boston had that.

"Like a Dear Friend"

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: The Red Letter Bible came safely. I am delighted with it; it is better than I expected, and will be highly prized. I have had a number of premiums, and have always found them better than I anticipated. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been like a dear friend to me for many years. I am unable to attend church, but can read the sermons at home. This Bible is truly wonderful.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

DEAR children:—This week we publish two new competitions. Those which were set in the paper dated December 10, close December 24th, and as soon as the answers have been examined the prizes will be awarded and the names of the winners will be published in the paper. The competitions announced on December 17th do not close until December 31st, but we shall be glad to receive your answers as soon as possible.

This week we are again offering a lady's or gentleman's beautiful silver watch as the first prize in both competitions, because a good watch is something which nearly every boy and girl wants to have. Of course, it is possible you may be fortunate enough to win the first prize in more than one competition. If so, your second prize shall be some other beautiful present of the same value as the watch. You will notice that we offer fifty consolation prizes in both competitions, so there is a very good chance if you do not win the first prize you will get one of the others.

Please tell all your friends, boys and girls, about these competitions; sometimes, as the old proverb says, "two heads are better than one" and there is no reason why you should not help one another or ask the help of grown-up persons. But each competitor must send in his answers in his own hand writing.

The Week's Competitions

Here are the competitions for this week. Before sending in your answers read the rules carefully.

Competition No. 1 Scripture Problem No. 3

The picture represents an incident described in the Old Testament. Write a description of it in your own language, using not more than twenty words.

SCRIPTURE PROBLEM, NO. 3

This picture represents a scene described in the Old Testament. Write a description of it, not more than twenty words in length. First read the rules carefully.

Competition No. 2. Curious Questions

1. What king, mentioned in the Bible, received a present of twenty cities and still was dissatisfied?
2. What do you learn of the nature and habits of the wolf from the Bible?
3. How many different kinds of milk are mentioned in the Bible?
4. Who is described in the Bible as using an iron bedstead?

No competitor shall be over fourteen years of age. A reader may enter one or both competitions. They are quite distinct. But no reader may send in more than one attempt for each competition. There is no rule against asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in his or her answer in his own handwriting.

IN Competition No. 1, the answer must be written on a postal card, or on one side of a sheet of paper. The name, age and address of each competitor must be clearly written at the top.

IN Competition No. 2, the competitor must answer as many of the questions as possible. The name, age and address must be written at the top of the first sheet of paper, and all the sheets must be numbered. The writing must be on only one side of each sheet of paper. No answer may be more than one hundred words in length.

Competition No. 1. The prize for the best description of the picture will be a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. To the fifty readers sending the next best answers, we will give a beautiful book, bound in rich white velum, with holly decorations in green, red and gold.

Competition No. 2. To the reader who sends in the best answers to the greatest number of questions, we will send a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. Fifty consolation prizes of the beautiful book mentioned above will also be awarded.

All attempts must reach this office not later than January 7th, 1903.

Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Little Folks' Department, Bible House, New York.

A Remarkable and Beautiful Incident, which Electrified a Quiet Congregation

PROBABLY never, within the whole range of coincidence, has there been any well authenticated record of an occurrence so beautiful and touching, and yet so remarkable, as the story which we print below. It is one of those incidents that would seem to defy human explanation; yet to discredit it is out of the question. Whatever the meaning, one cannot fail to be impressed with the symbolic beauty of the incident here related, which at the time of its occurrence, deeply stirred the people of a large section of New England. Our information on the subject comes from Mrs. L. K. Rees, of Chattanooga, Tenn., in the following letter:

We have the personal assurance of the pastor of the Congregational Church at East Haven, Conn., that the following beautiful and touching incident, as related in a local paper, is correct in every detail. The Rev. Mr. Clark was finishing the prayer preceding the sermon, when a dove lit upon the centre gallery and began gently cooing. The prayer closed, the dove perched on the gallery railing opposite the clergyman. When the chapter was being read, from which the text was taken, the dove cooed and stopped when the reader paused. The portion chosen was the first chapter of John, and on coming to the 32d verse, "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him;" the dove flew to the desk and perched upon the open pages. The text was the 4th verse of the chapter. Shortly afterward the dove flew in a circle over the singers, and then it settled upon the platform, below the pulpit, where it remained during the sermon, occasionally emitting a "coo-coo." At the conclusion of the sermon, before stepping down to lead the sacramental services, the preacher closed the Bible, whereupon the dove flew up and lit upon the closed book and cooed again three times, stepping off the book and then returning to it. It then nestled by the side of the sacred book, remaining there until the service closed.

The climax then transpired. Mr. Clark finished his service with a few remarks, in which, after noting the interruption that the dove had occasioned as having been remarkable, in view of the singular coincidence which all had noted, he added that as the Holy Spirit had descended on Christ, might not the presence of this winged visitor be taken as an emblem of the presence of the Spirit at this time and place? The bird then flew and lit directly upon the pastor's head. The effect upon him and the audience was electrical. Whereas, before, the dove had been regarded only as a curiosity and a smile, many now were moved to tears, and the whole assembly seemed deeply and strangely affected. The pastor took the dove and held it against his breast, and in that position, closed the services with the benediction.

According to its usual custom in such matters, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decided to make full inquiry concerning the foregoing very remarkable incident, before publishing. A letter was addressed to the Rev. D. J. Clark, East Haven, Conn., the pastor in question, who still lives there. Soon the answer came. It was a complete corroboration of the incident in every essential detail. We print Rev. Mr. Clark's letter below:

E. HAVEN, CONN., Dec. 4, 1902.

Editor of The Christian Herald.

DEAR SIR:—Your communication concerning the "dove episode" of Nov. 12, is at hand. It found me very busy. The event you refer to is a historic fact. It occurred in the East Haven Congregational Church, the first Sunday in September, 1887. The morning service had just begun when a white dove entered the church, at the open door, and after describing a circle above the platform, lit on the gallery railing at the left of the pulpit. There it remained, gently cooing until the reading of the scripture from the first chapter of John, the 32d verse: "And, John bare record saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him." At this point the dove flew and lit directly upon my head. I carefully reached to take the bird from my head, but, startled by my effort to seize it, it flew back to the gallery again, where it remained until after the sermon, gently cooing all the while.

As I stepped from the pulpit to the communion table below, the dove at once flew and lit upon the open Bible just above my head, carefully watching me while I broke the bread. While in the prayer of consecration, I prayed that the Holy Spirit might descend upon us, as typified in this strange incident, the dove again gently rested upon my head. I then carefully removed it from my head, handed it to one of the deacons, who carried it from the church.

Of course the effect of such a strange occurrence was very marked upon the people, and many comments were made. Some thought it a good omen, and others an omen of harm. Moistened eyes were in evidence throughout the room. It was certainly a thrilling experience for me, and while I attached no moral quality to the event, it impressed me most profoundly. Our local papers made much of it at the time, but I do not remember seeing it in any of our religious papers of wider circulation; yet I received some thirty letters of inquiry, some of congratulation, others of sympathy.

As I look back over the years of a successful and happy pastorate, I can but feel, if an omen at all, that it was of good.

Yours most truly, D. J. CLARK.

PROFESSOR TORREY IN INDIA

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

FOR the past few months, some of the missionaries and Christian workers of Madras have been praying earnestly for an outpouring of God's Spirit upon this city, upon India, and upon all flesh. Quite recently a little band met for prayer, and continued until after midnight in earnest supplication. Shortly after that a prayer-meeting, attended by representatives of nearly all the Protestant denominations, was held. It began at eight o'clock in the morning, and, with two intermissions, continued until six o'clock in the evening. The hearts of those assembled on that occasion were gladdened by the unexpected news that Dr. R. A. Torrey, Superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, whose labors within the last few months in Japan, China and Australasia were so abundantly blessed of God, would spend a few days in Madras. He was urged to come here by Miss M. B. Hill, Secretary of the Y. W. C. A., who had been a pupil in his Bible Institute. Dr. Torrey's first meeting was held at Memorial Hall on Tuesday evening, October 28. Mr. Chas. Alexander, who accompanies him in his missionary tour, led the singing, and Mr. Harkness played the piano. The first twenty minutes of the meeting were devoted to singing. It was evident at this first meeting that both Mr. Alexander and Mr. Harkness are masters of their calling; that Dr. Torrey, to a very eminent degree, studies to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth, and that he and his assistants carry with them the atmosphere of heaven.

At nine o'clock that same evening a reception was held in the rooms of the Y. W. C. A., Rundall's Road. Most of us had read of their wonderful work in Australia, when at times 10,000 people had clamored for entrance into a public hall, and that 8,500 converts had been invited to attend a praise meeting, and we expected Dr. Torrey to tell of that wonderful work; but instead, we were astonished to hear him give an account of what seemed to some of us a yet more wonderful work in Japan and China, not, indeed, as to numbers, but in its power to reach educated Japanese and Chinese men and women, and lead them to own Christ as their Saviour.

It was Dr. Torrey's intention to stay only three days in Madras, but a committee of missionaries urged him to remain over Sunday. The people came in ever-increasing numbers, and the final meetings were held in the largest halls in the city. Nearly one hundred professed to receive Christ as their Saviour; but many more received a new impetus in their Christian life, and a number the gift of the Holy Ghost.

11. Any inconsistency, or any difficulty whatever in this respect, will probably result in dangerous disputes, or the destruction altogether (of the) Government. 12. The break up might not be immediate, but it is not an improbability that loss of confidence in their representation might lead supporters to transfer their allegiance unexpectedly at the next opportunity to representatives promising more satisfactory things. 13. It is a peculiarity of popular representation, as we understand it, for which we may be thankful, that the desire (of the) country, when expressed with temperance and unanimity must be respected. 14. Government in accordance with public feeling is better than the attempt to govern in other ways. 15. Notwithstanding that this is more than ever understood, yet it is remarkable that some influential rulers, rather than make concessions, have faced the prospect of loss of power. 16. Those who thus transgress feel the results of their transgression; they have performed badly; they have had knowledge with power, but it must be acknowledged, have not allowed it to practically enlarge, nor has it enlarged their minds, and the immediate result has been anything but pleasant, though something at which even a stranger might not feel surprise. 17. "Knowledge is power," is a practical truth which an architect or the performer of any act of skill recognizes in his performance, and the photographer or short-hand writer acknowledges in his phonographic pursuits. 18. The latter knows, too, the importance of proper instruction and practice. 19. He knows that the uniform accuracy of his transcript depends on his own ability. 20. If the manuscript is a magazine article dealing with disinterestedness upon such a subject as the Catholic faith, or with religious architecture, he may need works of reference in any difficulty. 21. If he were to subscribe—and a small subscription would suffice—a messenger would bring them, whenever he desired them, together with architectural drawings; yesterday, I am told, he was expected to do so. 22. This is a more practicable way than he would, in all probability, have adopted.

REVIEW

1. What general principle of contraction may be employed in words of frequent occurrence? 2. In words ending in -action what consonant may be omitted? 3. Give an illustration of the omission of the medial consonant. 4. What does the hook n represent as a contraction?

Phraseography

201. The phonographic characters for a common phrase, consisting of several words naturally related to each other, are joined together and written without lifting the pen; for example, may be is written thus, and I have been, thus,

These groups of joined characters are known as phraseograms, and the employment of this method of writing is styled phraseography. Phraseograms should not be made of words that can only be joined with difficulty, nor should they be too long, or carry the pen too far from the line.

202. In phraseography I is frequently abbreviated by writing the first stroke only, for example, I represents I am, and I can.

203. Generally, the first logogram in a phrase must occupy its proper position; thus, can be, you can; but a logogram written in the first position may be raised or lowered to accommodate it to the following character, thus, I had, I see.

204. A logogram or phraseogram may be written over or close to a word to express con- or com-; thus, you will comply, I am content, and contrive, has commenced, and is content.

205. There or their may be added to a curved full-length logogram by doubling it; thus, for there, from their, in their, if there.

Either of these works will be sent post-paid on receipt of the amount by Isaac Pitman & Sons, 33 Union Square, New York. Lesson No. XXVII will appear in the issue of January 7th, 1903.

"More than Represented"

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: Have received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, The Hall of Fame, and "The Art Gallery." The book is really more than it is represented to be, and ought to take a foremost place in every library, private or public. The portraits are excellent. I have seen some of the "immortals" in life. In the Art Gallery, I think "Lost in the Storm" is grand; it is alone worth more to me than the full price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with which it is given free. I have seen the original painting in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and it has always been my favorite of all the magnificent paintings there.

New York City. MRS. A. M. BECHTED.

Birthday Gift

"I have just received a letter from a dear friend," writes a subscriber, "who tells me that the most valuable birthday gift she ever received is your Bible Dictionary, which I sent her some time ago. I knew that she lived in the country, loved her Bible, and loved to study it intelligently, but had few books of reference, and no public library near her. I wanted my Bible Dictionary, which came as a premium with your paper (the best family paper in the world) but I gave it to her. I am rewarded for my sacrifice. She tells me that the nearest church is seven miles distant, and in bad weather they often cannot reach it. So she gathers her own and her neighbors' children around her Sunday mornings and gives them a little Bible talk. She has found the Dictionary of the greatest help in enabling her to prepare the lesson intelligently, and to make it interesting. So your Dictionary is a Sunday School missionary sometimes." This book, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $3.

Salvation Army Christmas Dinner

To-morrow, at the Grand Central Palace, New York, the Salvation Army spreads its great Christmas feast for the poor. "We are hoping to carry Christmas cheer to 22,500 persons in their own homes by the distribution of basket dinners, besides providing dinners in the Grand Central Palace and elsewhere for at least 2,500 more," writes Commander and Consul Booth-Tucker to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "We are preparing to duplicate the immense provision made last year and the year before for New York's poor."

THE SHORTHAND BIBLE

The Holy Bible in Pitman's Phonetic Shorthand (Authorized Version), is now issued in a new and beautiful edition, which cannot fail to delight the eye of the phonographer. For perfection of form and beauty of outline, it is quite unlikely that any other shorthand book has ever appeared that can be compared with this publication, so graceful and artistic in those details that appeal to the phonographic appreciation. Every character is distinct and legible, and the "style" used throughout is easily read. Indeed, for the use of phonetic students, either in home reading, at church, or elsewhere, there is no book that will be more highly prized, 808 pages; cloth binding. Price $3. THINK HARD.

It Pays to Think About Food.

The unthinking life some people lead often causes trouble and sickness, as illustrated in the experience of a lady who resides in Fond Du Lac, Wis.

"About four years ago I suffered dreadfully from indigestion, always having eaten whatever I liked, not thinking of the digestible qualities. This indigestion caused palpitation of the heart so badly I could not walk up a flight of stairs without sitting down once or twice to regain breath and strength.

I became alarmed and tried dieting, wore my clothes very loose, and many other remedies, but found no relief.

Hearing of the virtues of Grape-Nuts and Postum Food Coffee, I commenced using them in place of my usual breakfast of coffee, cakes or hot biscuit, and in one week's time I was relieved of sour stomach and other ills attending indigestion. In a month's time my heart was performing its functions naturally and I could climb stairs and hills and walk long distances.

I gained ten pounds in this short time and my skin became clear and I completely regained my health and strength. I continue to use Grape-Nuts and Postum, for I feel that I owe my good health entirely to their use. I like the delicious flavor of Grape-Nuts and by making Postum according to directions, it cannot be distinguished from the highest grade of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

BY REV.
C. H.
YATMAN

PSALM XLI The Poor Man's Psalm

"CONSIDER THE POOR"

1. Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble.
2. The Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth; and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies.

No wonder this Psalm closes with a double "Amen." Poor people, who get such help as Jesus only can give, feel like pouring out double thanksgiving unto Him that considereth the poor. "They heard him gladly."

The rich are the poorest sometimes. The man who wrote this had plenty of gold, but it could not help like God.

PSALM XLIII The Psalm of Hope

"HYLLIGHT AND THY TRUTH"

5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

Hebrews, Chap. 6, makes good reading with this Psalm of Hope. The two change a wail of despair into a song—from being hopeless to being hopeful.

No man in trouble need travel a dark road long, if Faith will but look upward, light and truth will be sent downwards, and Hope and Charity go on their way rejoicing.

PSALM XLIV The Psalm of Confusion

"THE SHAME OF MY FACE"

15. My confusion is continually before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me.
16. For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth; by reason of the enemy and avenger.

17. All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant.
18. Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way.

Confusion and shame mingle here, and the cup must be drunk to the dregs by the good. Queer, indeed, is it that folk who fear and love God and forget him not, are so often overtaken by confusion; but there is a silver lining to the cyclonic cloud. Verse 22 is part of the "victory chapter" of the Bible—Romans 8. Come what may here, there will be none of this experience in heaven. The mists will have rolled away.

PSALM XLII Psalm for the Thirsty

"AS THE HART PANTETH"

1. As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.
2. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?
3. My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?

Thirsty for God! The waves and the billows had gone over the Psalmist; tears had been his meat day and night; the world had not only failed to satisfy him, but had overwhelmed him. No deer was ever so thirsty for water brook as he for help from above. Only the Water of Life can quench the thirst of a soul. Hearken! "Take of the Water of Life freely."

MAKING A FRESH START*

How the Good Resolutions for a New Year May be Kept

HOW many good resolutions are made at the beginning of a new year! There are few persons who, reviewing the past year, are not dissatisfied with themselves and regret that their conduct has not been better. There have been moments of weakness, when temptation has gained the advantage; times of unguarded mood, when the inconsiderate word, or the unkind word, has been spoken; occasions, when provocation or annoyance, has led to an outbreak of temper. These lapses, cannot be recalled; we deplore them, we repent of them, but they are gone beyond our power to retrieve; but, for the future, may we not hope for something better? That man is in a hopeless condition who can think of these things without grief; but it is idle and wasteful to let grief prey on the heart to no useful purpose. The wise course, is to let the sins of omission and commission of the past serve as warning, and as a stimulus to increased vigilance and more intense effort. He who has fallen on life's pathway, is ignoble if he lies prostrate in despair, or wastes his strength in bemoaning his fall. The noble, courageous traveler, is he who rises to his feet and resumes his journey, resolved to take better heed to his steps.

It is helpful at the beginning of a new effort to be completely assured that God sympathizes with us. "He knows our frame; he remembers that we are dust." The fact ought never to be used to apologize for sin; but it is legitimately applied as encouragement in renewing the struggle. It is God's desire that we should attain to holiness, should conquer the evil that is in us and around us and become strong in righteousness. It is for this that he pardons us so freely and readily. The wise father will punish his son, if that son has presumed on his father's forgiving disposition to do some wicked thing. The child must be made, for his own good, to understand the nature of his conduct and to realize that he cannot do wrong with impunity. But the repentant child who knows he has done evil, and is sorry for it, needs encouragement rather than punishment. The father has no words of reproof for him, but only of kindly warning and pity. So God treats his penitent children. Their sins are put away behind his back and his hand is extended to them in helpful leading.

Forgiveness to a noble nature is a tonic and a preservative, and God gives it for that purpose. We prove whether we are worthy of it by the use we make of it. "What carefulness it wrought in you," the Apostle Paul said to some of his converts, who had turned it to account. So, at the beginning of a new year, we are wise in making good resolutions, rather than in suffering our previous misconduct to render us despairing or indifferent. The Christian life is a battle all the way through, and the fact that we have been beaten, or have been remiss in the past ought to strengthen us to atone by new courage and effort. The Apostle uses his favorite simile to promote such a spirit. He would have us "put on the new man." The new spirit implanted in the believer, the new nature imparted to him at the new birth, should control and displace the old. It will do so, if we allow it to operate. If we do not check it, if we do not act contrary to it, it will take the mastery, and our outward conduct will correspond with the inward spirit. This is the secret of keeping good resolutions. The power is given, and it is sufficient. All that is necessary is to believe in it and use it. In every temptation, in every struggle, victory is assured if reliance is placed on the omnipotent power that God gives to all who put their trust in him.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN SURINAM

HOW THE LEPERS SING IN THE BAMBOO GROVES

"TO Father Roosevelt, my lepers commissioned me to give their respectful greetings," said the Moravian Missionary, Rev. Henry T. Weiss. "And to all his family," Mrs. Weiss added. "Thank you! Thank you!" said Mr. Roosevelt, warmly. The missionaries were in the White House, and the President, with hearty handshake, had welcomed them to the United States. A happy contrast this to their sad case when, a short while ago, they walked from door to door in New York only to be turned away. Not a soul would hear their pleadings for the lepers. Office-boys in the big buildings in Wall street told them merchants and bankers were too busy to listen. "Tell your people," said Mr. Roosevelt to the missionaries, "that I am highly interested in your noble work, and that I personally greatly value your efforts. Tell the lepers in Surinam that I think of them and that my sympathies go out to them."

Pastor Weiss' Christmas is not so sad as it promised to be. To CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, whose interest in his work has encouraged him greatly, he writes this account of last Christmas Eve in Bethesda, Groot Chatillon, Surinam:

REV. HENRY T. WEISS AND WIFE
The Missionaries who were received by President Roosevelt

"The sun had set behind the tropical forest. One evening bell is heard, then another. How melodiously they chime! The lepers are ringing in the festival of love divine.

The little Church of the Lepers stands veiled in darkness. A light appears, another, and another! It takes some time for the three lepers who have been appointed to light the 270 tapers arranged on the walls of the church, to fulfil their task. How the poor cripples rejoice! How their eyes glisten! Now the candles on the Christmas tree are also lighted.

Bethesda's share of the festal congregation patiently waits before the brilliantly illuminated church. Through the dark avenue of bamboo trees comes another band of pilgrims, accompanied by two deaconesses. Now they are passing over the little bridge-gate which separates Bethesda, our missionary asylum, from Groot Chatillon, the government asylum. In the infirmiry vehicle, drawn by the nurse, sits lame Monsanto. Blind and lame Kampf leans on the arm of Sister Philippina. The last bell rings; the church doors open and the company of cripples, lame and blind, all dressed in white, enter and take their seats. Many would not call the singing of these lepers harmonious, and yet I believe that our Father in heaven loves to hear them sing. At the close of the service those who are still able to kneel, kneel in prayer. Now, Binda, the seventeen-year-old coolie, comes forward to the baptismal font to receive the rite of holy baptism. The baptism of Binda by the beautiful light of the Christmas tapers, remains one of the most cherished recollections of my missionary activity. Binda sleeps his last sleep on the edge of the forest, where, beside him, lies many another, who, a year ago, worshipped in the little church of the lepers.

They were happy over their Christmas gifts—meagre though of need these were—hanging on the tree. But Binda felt he had the best gift of all. As the white-robed procession filed out of the chapel and moved away through the bamboo trees, I heard them singing: 'O, holy night! O, night when Christ was born!'

CHRISTMAS at the OLD HOME

SEE PICTURE ON COVER OF THIS ISSUE

It is a familiar and, to most people, a very tender theme which Professor Anton de Neogrady has chosen for his beautiful picture on the first page cover of the present number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Such a picture tells its own story. The old people, who have been watching, perhaps for hours, for the dear ones and the grandchildren, give them the heartiest kind of welcome when they finally drive up in the moonlight after a ride through the crisp snow. Cheery lights gleam from the windows of the old homestead and through the latticed panes may be seen the bright decorations, on the table and sideboard, which the old grandmother has put there to honor the occasion and the guests. This fine picture was painted specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Professor Neogrady, and he has certainly been fortunate in his selection and treatment of the subject. It will please our readers to know that we have retained Professor Neogrady to paint for this journal a series of aquarelles (water-colors), which we will publish from time to time.

Professor Neogrady is the descendant of an old and noble Hungarian family. He is forty-one years of age, and has studied art with the most celebrated masters at the academies of Budapest, Munich and Paris. In 1894 he won the Eszterhazy prize. Another prize picture was bought for the Royal National Museum of Art, Budapest. Six years ago, he was offered by the Hungarian Government the Professorship of the Royal Academy for Painting, at Budapest, which he accepted and still holds. The King of Hungary bought from this year's Salon a painting by Mr. Neogrady for his private collection. This painting was reproduced in the last June number of the London Studio, whose critic praises highly the artistic methods whereby Mr. Neogrady succeeds in obtaining the most striking effects.

The Professor is in the United States on a brief leave of absence. He is much impressed with the greatness of this country, with its cultured development in art, as well as its commercial growth. He has the greatest appreciation of the purity of American home life and American humanitarian institutions.

The "Cellar Mission"

The year's report for the Minetta Mission, well known to our readers as an excellent rescue work, conducted by negroes for people of their own race in a section of this city where many negroes live, has been sent to this office by Rev. Samuel H. Hale, pastor and manager of relief work. In 1901, eighty families received material aid as well as spiritual instruction; 200 free meals were furnished; self-supporting employment was found for 149 men and 51 women; 102 lodgings were furnished to the homeless; 156 garments were distributed; 245 sick persons were visited; 280 religious services were held; thirty pauper dead were laid away with Christian burial. When it is remembered how poor are the devoted little band of negroes sustaining this work out of their slender means, and with their personal services (given after days of toil), this record is most creditable. The mission-room is in a cellar. Rev. Mr. Hale writes: "But for the sympathy and aid of our employers, we could not accomplish what we do; the gentleman for whom I used to cook has helped us. Once, when we were in a great strait, and it seemed we could not reach any friends able to help us, Dr. Klopsch came to our aid and kept us from being disappointed. Superintendent Hallimond, of the Bowery Mission, Mr. John Long, and other members of the Rescue League there have aided us much by holding services for us. We hope to accomplish more for the Lord next year. There are many barrooms and much sin and misery around us, and we need to be up and doing."

I would go with the missionary to visit them in their tepees, and I felt it was a privilege to have even a small part in bringing Christ to these strange people who still dwell in tents.

One of the most interesting events of those days which I spent at Ross Fork, was an Indian funeral. The boy who died was a child of devoted parents, a bright, intelligent little fellow, about thirteen years old. The funeral was a typical Indian ceremony. After a death in an Indian family, the Indians always move immediately out of their tent and go off some distance, never returning to the old place to live again. In this case, the boy was brought to a relative's camp not far from the mission. They sent for friends far and wide. Miss Garrett and myself went over to see what we could do to help them. When we arrived, there was a long line of vehicles, and great numbers of Indians with their many-colored blankets and ornaments, making a strange and unusual scene. Piteous cries went up that were heartrending to hear. The little body was laid out on a Navajos blanket, being decorated with barbaric ornaments for the grave. The burying-ground was about three miles out from the agency on a sage brush plain. There was not a tree in sight, only bare mountains and sage brush. The Indians spread a tent and took the little boy, laid him on rugs underneath the awning, and then gathered around him, weeping, wailing and moaning for five hours. Our missionary was in and out among them, giving help and comfort. One poor Indian girl wept until she fainted. Other women cut themselves on arms and limbs, as the custom is. After a time, the old grandfather rode up on horseback with another Indian in half-nude dress, their bodies painted, and together they took the little dead boy on horseback in front of the grandfather. Thus he rode round the burying-ground several times, followed by scores on horseback, sending up pitiful wails. The father of the boy painted the lad's face, and all the relatives crowded on his fingers and arms rings and bracelets, loading him with all the ornaments they had, as a last token of love, that he might not go empty-handed into another world. The mother, who came on horseback, took off a handsome jacket strung with elk's teeth, probably worth several hundred dollars, and put it over her boy. Other garments handsomely beaded were also thrown in the grave. The little fellow was dressed in a richly adorned buckskin suit. We sang two hymns, and they filled up the grave with clothing of all kinds, pillows, shoes, saddles and everything that belonged to the lad, then mother earth supplied the rest.

As we went back to the mission, we could not help pondering upon the need of doing all in our power to bring to these people the Gospel which Christ told us to carry to every creature.

Her Pastor "Years Ago"

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: My husband and I are greatly pleased with your beautiful premium, The Speaking Oak. The author, Rev. F. C. Iglehart, was a beloved pastor of mine many years ago, in an Indiana town, and it seems like renewing old-time friendship to see his pictured face and read his stories. I still enjoy picking up the book you sent last year, Heaven, Home and Happiness. I always find something comforting and uplifting in it. I have shown the paper and books to all of our friends. We like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD better than any paper we have ever taken, not excepting our own church paper. Cincinnati, O. MRS. W. A. MANN. Either of these books, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD one year, $2.

.. Special Offer ..

WITH EVERY ORGAN PURCHASED FOR SPOT CASH BEFORE FEB. 1, WE WILL SEND FREE TEN ADDITIONAL TUNES OF YOUR OWN SELECTION (15 IN ALL), CONSTITUTING A FREE GIFT OF $3 WORTH OF MUSIC. GOOD ONLY TO JAN. 31, 1903.

These Beautiful Instruments are the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs, and are confidently offered to the public. These musical wonders use no paper, but music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins. These pins operate upon valve keys, made of hard steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on metal castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these grand instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music. They will play Hymns and Popular Airs, with a clearness and accuracy, and degree of execution which but few performers can equal. A mere child can play them. They have the carrying quality of a Large Pipe Organ, and are the only instruments that will render slow and sacred music with a powerful, sustaining organ tone. They will play tunes as long as desired, without any break, instead of stopping to change the piece, as must be done with organettes. They are beautifully finished in solid walnut. The reeds are organ size, and the volume of tone will fill a hall. They are Genuine Musical Instruments, which anyone can play, without teacher or practice, and which good musicians can recommend. The price is nothing compared with their intrinsic value. They are equal in every way to a $50 Music Box, so far as the quality of the music is concerned, and also in point of construction, finish, and decoration. This organ is the most simple, perfect, marvelous, instructive, enjoyable, and amusing musical instrument in the world. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, it is just what is wanted. It will play all the sacred music, and as many verses as desired, without stopping to replace the music roller. This great advantage no other instrument has. By this means, a result is attained that was never reached before.

| 730 Everlasting Arms | 735 Jerusalem the Golden |
| 731 Blessed Rock | 736 It is God's Way
(President McKinley's last words) |

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on application.

REMEMBER, ONLY

LITTLE BUILDERS AT THE SAND-PILE

THE EVOLUTION of the SETTLEMENT

A NOBLE WORK OF SELF-SACRIFICING HELPFULNESS BEING DONE IN CHICAGO AND OTHER AMERICAN AND ENGLISH CITIES

A SUMMER OUTING

T is difficult to realize that the Settlement movement is less than half a century old. The idea is so obviously beneficent, so thoroughly in harmony with the principles of Christianity, because it is so Christlike, that one wonders that fifty generations of Christians could have lived and died before such a movement was inaugurated.

The spirit which caused the disciples to marvel, when they found their Master talking with the woman of Samaria, and which caused the people of Jericho to murmur, because Christ was "gone to be guest with a man who was a sinner," persisted a long time. At last, with so much new light that has broken forth from the Scriptures, in these latter times, the incongruity of that spirit with Christianity has been recognized, and in the great cities on both sides of the Atlantic, noble men and women are laying down their lives in protest against it.

In the slums, where vice and crime abound; in the districts where working-men and their families live, and in the suburbs of cities where better paid artisans and clerks make their homes, there have sprung up unpretentious houses, which have become centres of Christian influence. Men and women of birth and education and not infrequently of wealth, go there and live among the people, not patronizing them, not distributing alms to them, not directly teaching them; but simply living their more refined life among them, talking with them, entertaining them, and helping them to reach a higher plane. The newcomers are neighbors in the best sense of the word; and the neighborly spirit shows itself, as it did in the Samaritan, who was "neighbor to him who had fallen among thieves," in rendering just the services that are most needed. A typical illustration of the work done in these settlements will show its character better than any description. It is found in one of the newest settlements, recently opened on the West Side of Chicago, for a report of which we are indebted to the president, Miss Ellen Holt.

At the busy corner of Robey street, Chicago, where two electric and one cable line cross each other, and the elevated rumbles noisily by overhead, you will find the Association House Settlement. You may not recognize it at first, for the once gaily painted front and stained glass windows remind you of a saloon. Four years ago, this building was a saloon, and all the other gathering places and centres of amusement in the neighborhood were saloons, too, or had saloons connected with them. In the factories, tailor shops, and laundries of the neighborhood, worked at least fifteen hundred young women.

All of them supported themselves, many helped their families, most of them began working at the age of thirteen or fourteen. Of these girls, many were bright, attractive, ambitious, but their chances for social or practical improvement were extremely limited. A group of them met in a tailor shop, and prayed that the Lord would send someone to open more opportunities to them and to their families. Through Miss Poxon, who had been for many years a missionary in that district, the call came to the American Committee of the Young Women's Christian Association. A petition, signed by one hundred and fifteen working women, asked that an not only her needs as an isolated individual, but also those of her family.

Four clubs of young women meet at Association House, a Mother's Friendly Group of one hundred and forty members, five clubs of little girls and five of little boys, and two clubs of young men. All of these clubs are self-governing and hold monthly business meetings. The young women have each month a birthday supper, which celebrates all the birthdays which have occurred during the month. They have also talks and lectures, some literary work, Bible classes, and classes in domestic art and science. Cooking classes have always proved among the most attractive, as the young women realize how much good cooking means to a happy home. They realize, too, how urgent is the call for them to make home attractive

A GIRLS' SEWING CLUB AT ASSOCIATION SETTLEMENT, CHICAGO

Association be opened in that neighborhood, the signers agreeing that they would always be the loyal supporters and helpers of the Association. The present building was rented in June, 1899, and was transformed from a saloon and flats into a Young Women's Christian Association Settlement.

The first gathering was that of a group of mothers, who came as a scrub party; the second a group of young women, who formed a prayer circle of thanksgiving for the house. So, consecrated to cleanliness and godliness began the life of Association House. Two thoughts have always been kept in mind in the Settlement: First, that "Christ is the head of this house," and second, that though primarily for young women, the house must answer to fathers and brothers, and they give up many a pleasant evening at Association House to make music and a good time at home. Many of the young women have found Christ at Association House, and one of them said in prayer, at one of the Sunday services, "O Lord, to pass this house makes us think of thee."

For the little girls cooking and sewing are the useful branches taught. In their various clubs they have their own good times with their leaders. For the active little boys the more occupation the better, and they have already carpentry, basket-weaving and clay-modeling, with a prospect of iron-work also. They have been taught to debate, and to conduct a trial, and have passed upon the conduct of some of their own members. They are bright little fellows and learn quickly. They have also the patience and perseverance of their races, as most of them are Scandinavian or German. The Mother's Friendly Group is the one which stands for cheer and comfort where it is most needed. While the young women in their shops and factories bear heavy burdens, the mothers are the ones to whom life is all work and no play. It is refreshing to see that play has not died out of their hearts, and they enter into merriment and pleasure with the abandon of children.

The district nurse of the Visiting Nurses' Association is in very cordial co-operation with the Settlement, and through her the workers can meet many cases of need, while she in turn gives much needed care to the sick among the Settlement people. The mothers are very loyal and self-sacrificing in their helpfulness to one another, as well as in their expressions of affection toward the House and its residents.

For all club and class work, dues and fees are paid. In some cases a friend at a distance may help some specially overburdened girl by supplying her dues. Outside of these dues, and the board paid by the residents, the Settlement, like other educational institutions, is dependent on the generosity of its friends.

Every Sunday afternoon, at Association House, a vesper service is held, with an attendance of from fifty to one hundred. It is a very simple service, heartily entered into by all who are present. Often the members of one club are made responsible for the invitations and singing or for the entire programme. There is also a missionary league, with a membership from different clubs, and this society has sent many contributions to foreign lands. The Bible Class, held on Monday evenings, has always been a source of strength to the Settlement.

During the summer the work is necessarily of a different character from that of the winter. Much attention is given to outings. This summer two hundred people went to different homes or outing camps for rest of a week or two, and about seven hundred enjoyed one-day outings. All important in the summer work is the playground. For two years the Settlement conducted a successful playground on borrowed property. This past summer this ground could no longer be obtained, so the boards of the Settlement concluded to establish a permanent playground, and began the pur-

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

The Story of Life

A SERMON FOR THE CLOSING YEAR

OW the years are flying away! Henry Clay once stood upon the top of the Allegheny Mountains, in an attitude of listening. When someone asked him to what he was listening, the great Kentucky statesman, in his deep, powerful, resonant, oratorical voice, answered, "I am listening to the mighty tramp of the coming generations!" To-day, we may not have an imaginative ear keen enough to hear the thunderous echoes of the moving feet which shall walk this earth, two centuries or a thousand years hence, but we can now hear the pattering feet of the multitudes of school children. We may hear, too, the rumbling of the hearse, which shall sooner or later carry out our dead bodies to the newly-dug graves. We hear the inexorable warning that, in a few years, or perhaps even in the coming year of 1903, we shall look upon the rising sun for the last time. Then our bedrooms, where we have often slept, and laughed, and cried, shall be called the "Chambers of Death." Dear old year of 1902! It seemed only yesterday that we welcomed thee into the world. In a few days, with thy snow-white hair and shrivelled form, and pallid cheek, and trembling limb, we shall have to carry thee out and lay thee away, until we meet thy condemning or approving face at the Judgment Seat of heaven.

The inspired Psalmist, considering the passing of an earthly life uses a beautiful simile. Moses, to whom the Psalm is ascribed, was not only a great legislator and a powerful leader, but a poet. He not only opened a path across the Red Sea with his rod, but he cut a sure path into the gratitude and affection of all good men and women by the sharp point of his pen. Thus the ancient author, who was a pioneer in the making of books, compared the earthly existence of every human life "to a tale that is told." The seconds are the letters. The minutes are the words. The hours are the sentences. The days are the paragraphs. The weeks are the pages. The months are the chapters. The years are the books. The whole number of different books of the human story of life, like the five different books of Victor Hugo's great novel Les Misérables, are bound together in one big volume, with a slat from the cradle to serve for one cover and a tombstone used for the other cover. May God help me, on this last Sabbath of the dying year, to interpret aright how "we spend our years as a tale that is told."

The Bright Beginning

Every tale, whether fictitious or no, has a bright or a sad beginning. In almost the first words which the narrator speaks, he introduces his listeners to the hero, or the heroine. Sometimes he rocks that hero's cradle down among the plantations of Louisiana, or Georgia; sometimes among the snows of the New England hills, or in a palace of Europe, where the prince or princess was born. But though many heroes and heroines of fictitious tales may have had unhappy childhood influences, I do not believe it was thus with us. The brightest passages of the "tale of life" when applied to our own biographies, are to be found for the most part in those first days which we spent in the old homestead. We never had those huge monsters, the sons of Tartarus and Terra, to storm our nurseries. We never had a murderous guardian, a King Richard, to incarcerate us in a dungeon; nor a fiendish Martha, of Goethe's Faust, for a nurse—our infantile playground was more like the Delectable Mountains of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Therefore, as most of our lives have started amid such purified surroundings, it is no more than right to expect that our stories of life should be pure and true and noble tales.

But alas, no sooner were we born and grown into young manhood and womanhood, than the current of our lives led us away. Our biographies cannot be told to the world at large. The beautiful ancient ballad of, "The Marriage of Sir Gawain," describes how the cavalier of old took to himself in marriage a hideous woman called the "loathly lady," merely because no one else would marry her. As soon as the "loathly lady" was wedded, she immediately changed into a bride of the most winsome loveliness, because—so goes the story—that marriage ring was able to enchain a malignant enchanter, who had been cursing her life heretofore. Alas, "The Marriage of Sir Gawain" has been reversed in many of our lives. Most of us came forth fair and beautiful from a Christian mother's nursery. Fair and beautiful though we once were, we accepted for our guide the proffered hand of sin. Then, in the sight of God and all heaven, we became like the "loathly lady," accursed by the evil past in which we had lived. No matter how pure and bright our nativity may have been, we have all sinned in the sight of God. "There is none that doeth good, no not one, not one." The brightness of a Gospel sunrise has been darkened by the stormy clouds of a sinful midnoon.

The hero of each tale, whether fictitious or no, has his life entwined in the existence of many other lives. We find this thought best illustrated perhaps in Wilkie Collins' Dead Secret, or No Name, or The Woman in White, or of Anna Katherine Green's Leavenworth Case, or of Conan Doyle's famous and strange wanderings of Sherlock Holmes. These and similar authors we read, not for their epigrammatic sayings, as we do the writings of a William M. Thackeray; but we read them for the deft way in which they disentangle

The Snarled Skein of a Human Plot

No sooner are their principal characters born, than the authors let them worm their way through intricate and weird surroundings, until at last they lead them to the marriage altar, or if the story be a tragedy, into the gaping mouth of an open grave. Someone took Ian Maclaren to task for creating so many dissolute characters in his books. The author of Bonnie Brier Bush answered, "Man, how can I help creating many dissolute characters? After my characters are once born, they live their own lives, and do whatever damage they please. Some of them will get drunk. Some of them will lie and steal. Some of them will break their loved ones' hearts. My characters, after they are once born, dominate me; I cannot control them."

Every true story of life must represent it as mixed up in the lives of many others. This is always so. You may have seen in some art gallery a picture of the Three Parcae, the Fates that are supposed to decide the destinies of every man. Clotho is there pictured as a beautiful woman, holding the birth spindle out of which the thread of life is to be drawn. Atropos is a beautiful woman pulling forth that thread, and thereby deciding what the man's life is to be. Lachesis is an old hag, with a pair of sharp shears cutting that thread, and making an end of that mortal life. But I want to remind you to-day that, in the story of life, in other lives. Before that thread is cut, it passes into the world's loom, among and around other threads, adding its textile strength to the warp and woof. In the nursery, the Fates are not alone the three in the picture, but a multitude which are weaving that thread. What a mother does may decide to a great extent what her children will do. In the dining-room, there are more than three Fates influencing the lives of young men. What the father does, may decide what his boys will do. A wife's position upon the temperance question may decide whether or no her husband shall die of delirium tremens. The tale of every human life is a plot in which the happiness of a mother, a father, a brother, a sister, a wife, a child, a friend, may be dependent upon the purity and the nobility of one man. When the heart of the old oak is eaten out, not only does the mighty tree fall, but also all the clinging vines which have clambered up the sides of the tree; all the birds' nests in which the feathered mothers have laid their eggs; also all of the leaves which are kissed of the sunlight, and are rustling with joy. In the story of life, when the hero does wrong, it brings disaster upon every life with whom that hero comes in touch. Our lives are all entwined with other lives.

Every Man's Life is Entwined

Every tale, whether fictitious or no, has its depressions as well as its elevations. It has its disappointments and heartaches and sorrows, and often its graves, as well as its joys and reunions and marriage altars. It has always been so. An auditor would not sit hour after hour, as the ancients used to do, listening to the

TEXT, PSALM 90: 9:

We spend our years as a tale that is told imaginative story-tellers of old, if lights and shadows had not continually chased each other across their fictitious heavens.

But though every story, whether fictitious or no, may have its ups and downs, yet the general rule is, the greater the danger and the blacker the sorrow and the more overwhelming and imminent the threatening destruction, the nearer is the appearance of the deliverer, the saviour or the redeemer. It is when all hope seems to be forever gone; that we are relieved by the entrance of some character who is able to chase away the black-winged demon of despair, and lead forth the white-robed angel of hope. You may remember an illustration of this rule in Lord Lytton's famous historical novel, The Last Days of Pompeii? While old Mount Vesuvius was writhing in agony and belching forth a reservoir of burning lava, and while the heavens were raining a tempest of fire, and the midday was as black as the darkness of the Egyptian plague, did not the blind girl, Nydia, take her lover by the hand and lead him forth out of the doomed city, out past the Roman sentinel who stood by the gate, preferring to die rather than to desert his post, out to the blue waters of the Mediterranean, in which there was safety? Is not this statement true of the beautiful story of Dickens' Tale of Two Cities, or of Scott's Ivanhoe, or of Cooper's Pathfinder, or of Shakespeare's King Lear, and true of almost any of the works of the ancient story-writers, as well as the stories written by the authors of the present day?

So general is this rule, that the Psalmist may have had it in mind, when he declared that "we spend our years as a tale that is told," and is practically saying: "You know that in the tale, the time of the greatest darkness is usually the time of rescue; so, in real life, every man and woman, every human hero or heroine, even in the darkest days of mortal life can have a divine Rescuer, a Redeemer, a Saviour." We can have the Redeemer or Saviour, that General Lew Wallace depicted in his famous religious novel, Ben Hur. First, the author leads us into the home of wealth. Then, with ruthless hand, he tears down the tapestries. He shatters that home. He drives forth the mother and the beautiful daughter, as accursed. He drives them forth covered with the white flakes of fatal leprosy. He drives them forth until, as outcasts, they are living among the tombs, and associating with the corpses. Then he brings forth the Saviour—it is the same Jesus who once said to the ten lepers: "Go, show yourselves unto the priests; and it came to pass as they went, they were cleansed." The same Saviour, by a few words, cleanses the two helpless women, in the same way as John Bunyan depicted him as saving when he wrote: "So, I saw in my dream, that as Christian came up with the Cross, his burden loosed from off his shoulders, and fell from off his back, and began to tumble, and so continued to do until it came to the mouth of the Sepulchre, where it fell in, and I saw it no more. Then was Christian glad and litesome, and said with a merry heart: 'He hath given me rest by his sorrow, and life by his death.'" Thus, it remains with us alone, whether or no, in our story of life, we will take Jesus Christ to be our Saviour, our Redeemer, our Divine Rescuer. It rests with us, whether the dying year of 1902, shall be a mournful guide to lead us into a Dante's Inferno, or a God's messenger to lead us into a Milton's Paradise Regained.

The story of life is always a finished tale. In the world of story-telling, we find many unfinished tales. Charles Dickens' fingers began to stiffen in death when he was in the midst of writing his novel, Edwin Drood. Another author has tried to finish the great master's work, but has not been able to make a success of it. Sometimes the authors purposely leave their stories unfinished. A new school of writers has lately sprung up who have tried to imitate Frank Stockton, in The Lady or the Tiger. These authors, or story-tellers, work their readers up to an intense pitch of excitement. Then they suddenly close their stories. They leave their readers to work out the solution as they please. Frank Stockton declared that for years he received hundreds of letters asking him to solve the problem of that story. "But," said he, "I am just as much in doubt how that book should end, as any of my readers. It was because I could not decide whether the young girl was willing to destroy or save her lover, that I ceased writing."

Fictitious stories are often unfinished; but the human tales about which the Psalmist wrote are always ultimately finished tales. These biographies may lead many of us through the schoolroom to the marriage altar; they may lead us to great honors in life, but they will always lead everyone of us to the grave. When the epitaphs have been inscribed upon our tombstones, what has been done, will be done forever; what has been left undone, will be left undone forever. The story of mortal life will then be ended. The earthly covers of the volume will be forever closed. We have often heard of aged authors recasting and rewriting the stories they had written in their youth. The publishers of the Reveries of a Bachelor asked its author to rewrite his most famous book; they asked him to rewrite it long after Ik Marvel had ceased to be a bachelor, and when he had a wife and a crowded nursery of his own. But the tale of human life, after it has once been finished, can never be recast. We have heard how one of the sweetest and purest poets of the West, at great expense, gathered up some vicious and impure stories which he had written when he was a college boy. He gathered them up to destroy them. But when the human tale of life has been once told, it can never be silenced. It shall be told and retold again and again, as it was last told at the grave.

But there is yet one overwhelming thought we must not overlook. The tale of life is a spoken story. We may read The Tales from the Aegian, The Tales of a Wayside Inn, The Tales Out of School, Tales of New England and Twice-Told Tales, but after all, the true definition of a tale is a story spoken by a human being into the ears of one or more listeners. Sometimes those ancient story-tellers were able to excite their hearers to a mad frenzy. It has been recorded that when the Greeks used to listen to the recital of the Adventures of Ulysses, or the story of Helen of Troy, they would weep and cry, and shout as they climbed from the lowest depths of grief to the highest pinnacles of joy. What would be the effect on the hearers if the tale of our lives was told? Would it excite them to a frenzy of sin or would it draw from them triumphant and holy ejaculations?

But this was not the chief thought which I desired to impress upon you. When our tales of life are told, they are not only spoken into human ears, but also into the all-hearing ear of God. It used to be a terrible thought for me to feel that in heaven there was a recording angel; to know that, every time I opened my mouth, my words were being recorded, as a human voice, spoken into the phonograph, makes its indentations upon a revolving cylinder. Months after my father's death, I can now hear his voice repeating the Lord's prayer as he once did in one of those instruments at the national Capitol. But, oh, how much more overwhelming the thought that every word we utter is spoken directly into the ear of our Divine Father; how much more tremendous to know that when "we spend our years as a tale that is told," we can never get beyond the reach of God's ear! Ought not this nearness to God to make us strive, by Divine Grace, to live better and purer lives? I once read how a great king of old used to confine his prisoners within a chain of dungeons. Every one of those cells was connected by a whispering gallery with the king's own bedchamber. Thus the slightest word these state prisoners might utter during their confinement was immediately echoed to the king's ear, and if the prisoners said anything against their king he heard it, and these prisoners were immediately taken out and executed. Shall not you and I be more careful to live the right kind of lives, when we fully realize that each word we utter is heard by our Divine Father? Shall we not be more careful—not because we fear the anger of a tyrant, but because we do not want to wound God's loving heart, any more than we would say a harsh or sinful word before a loving earthly parent?

"We spend our years as a tale that is told." That means, in the story of life, that we are about to pass from one book to another. The year of 1902 is nearly finished. The year of 1903 is just about to begin.

The passing year has been a sad one for many of us. During the past twelve months, two of my family have finished their earthly lives, as a tale that is told. As I sit writing this discourse, I hold in my hand one of the last letters my father ever wrote to me. It goes something like this: "Dear Frank: My last birthday tells me that I have reached the Psalmist's limit—three score years and ten. My earthly pilgrimage of life will not continue very much longer." Within a few months that journey ended. How soon it was to end, he little thought. Within the past year, my brother-in-law left us, leaving behind a widow and her little children, who are now nearer and dearer to us on account of their loss. In your life, the year 1902 has been a sad year. You have had your troubles, just the same as I. But the year of 1902 has also been a joyful year; it has been a year of many blessings. It has also been a year when those who have left us have gone to be with Him who is their Saviour and their King.

But the year 1902 has also been for all of us, a year of sin. If this chapter of the tale of life is written, how many soiled pages there are? Not one of us has lived up to our many good opportunities. We have been guilty both of sins of omission and sins of commission. Like the Psalmist, we have reason to cry out in agony, "Oh, God, thou knowest my foolishness, and my sins are not hid from thee." But though the year 1902 has been a year of many shortcomings, it may yet be made a year of divine pardon. There are a few hours of the old year left; can we, shall we not crowd these last few lines of the book of 1902 full of penitent prayers—of earnest and tender pleadings; full of resolves to undo as far as we can the wrongs we may have done to others?

But the time is speeding away, and I must close. Like a dying invalid, the breath of the old year is growing shorter and shorter. The pulse is getting weaker and weaker. What we are to do, we must do very quickly. Even now, the eyes are becoming glassy. Soon there will be a long gasp—then another—then 1902 will be dead!

Oh, my loved ones, will you not get down upon your knees and ask God to make this year, even in its closing hours, a year of divine pardon, and triumphant hope?

One year, one year, one little year,
And so much gone—
And yet the even flow of life, Moves calmly on.
Lord of the living, and the dead,
Our Saviour dear,
We lay in silence at thy feet,
This sad, sad year!

chase of a piece of property in the neighborhood. The city furnished a fence, and the playground was laid out with every facility for a good time for young and old; swings, teeters and sandpile vied with tennis, croquet, basket-ball and all manner of other games in popular favor. All day long the grounds were crowded, the daily average of children being about two hundred and fifty. In the evening an average of four hundred grown people enjoyed the fresh air and good times on the playground.

With all these happy times there was a dark side to the picture. Through the playground many cases of poverty and need were discovered, and in some cases it was found to be necessary to take children away from father and mother, and provide other homes for them. The playground proved a great advertisement for Association House, bringing it in touch with many new families and making its existence known far and wide in the neighborhood. The building occupied by the Settlement was crowded to its limit last year, and while some provision has been made for extended work this year, the crowding is no less. On one end of the playground property is an old frame residence which has been fitted up for residents' rooms and club rooms. It is small and can be used only as an annex to the other quarters. Homelike and pleasant as both buildings are, they are far from meeting the need for space. Workers, residents, and neighborhood people alike are hoping and praying that some friend or friends may be led to see the usefulness and helpfulness of the Association House Settlement, and to build for it a suitable and appropriate building. Into a new building would be carried the cheer and homelikeness, and the Christian spirit which have always been the charm of Association House.

The work at the famous Hull House in Chicago, where Miss Jane Addams presides; at the numerous Settlements in New York previously described in this journal; at Whittier House, Jersey City, under the leadership of Miss Bradford; in Philadelphia, Boston and in many other cities, has the same characteristics. They are not charitable institutions, and it is very seldom, and only in cases of emergency, that money is given away in them; but the people get help there, which is better than money gifts. They get sympathy in trouble, advice in their difficulties, and a warm welcome when they go to the Settlement for any cause. The residents are simply neighbors, contributing to the social life of the people around them, such cheer and brightness as come from music, pictures, general information and friendly interest. They get in touch with the people, find out their way of life, and render them such assistance as can be done without wounding their feelings. They are also frequently able to better their household conditions. Many a landlord, growing rich on the rents of tenement house property, presuming on his tenants' ignorance of the law, fails to carry out its provisions of periodical whitewashing, etc., until he learns that the workers of the Settlement, who have made a study of the law, call his attention to its provisions in the interest of their neighbors, his tenants. In many other ways the knowledge of the residents is useful to their friends, and it is always at their service. "Go to the Settlement," said a woman to another, who was smarting under injustice that she was powerless to resist,—"Go to the Settlement; at the least they will listen to you." It is something, when in trouble, to have a listener even if he has no help to give, and these people have found it out. If proof of the value of the Settlement was needed, it could be found abundantly in the appreciation of the people around it.

The idea of the Settlement originated in England, in 1860, when Frederick Denison Maurice persuaded some graduates of Cambridge University to conduct classes in London, in his Working Men's College. It was soon discovered that while much good might be done in that way, the real object of coming in close contact with the poor, could be attained only by living among them. Edward Denison, a young Oxford graduate, took that step in the parish of Rev. John Richard Green, the historian. Mr. Denison's success was remarkable; but his health broke down and he died before seeing its full growth. But Arnold Toynbee caught the inspiration, and, in 1875, began the work that has made Toynbee Hall famous over the world. During the next fifteen years the movement grew rapidly. Protestants and Catholics, men and women, entered into it, and Settlements multiplied, not in London only, but in other parts of the country and in Scotland. In a short time, the movement spread to this country. The conditions were not so exigent as in England, but in the great cities the appalling need of it was apparent. The New York College Settlement, in Rivington street, was established in 1889, and almost simultaneously the Hull House in Chicago. In close succession came the Denison House and the Andover House, both in Boston, and the St. Mary Street Settlement in Philadelphia. The value of the work was abundantly proved wherever it was undertaken, and it has multiplied and extended throughout the country.

A remarkable feature of Settlement work is that its benefits are mutual. God has so ordered the conditions of our life, that no one can honestly and sincerely do anything for the benefit of another, without being blessed in the doing of it. It is especially so in the Settlement. There is uniform testimony from all those who have worked in it, that there is no pleasure in society, or social dissipation, to be compared with the joy that fills the soul in lifting the burden from the shoulders of some weary brother or sister, or in shedding a little of the light of education and refined culture into the darkened lot of some toil-worn soul. So the promise of the inspired Book is fulfilled: "He that watereth shall be watered also himself."

THE WAR FLURRY IN VENEZUELA

Deferring to the Monroe Doctrine
the Powers Decide to Accept Arbitration

FOR weeks past, Europe and America have been intently watching developments in the South American republic of Venezuela. Twice in a decade has that country been a cause of international unrest. On the first occasion, it was the famous boundary dispute, in which England claimed 40,000 square miles of Venezuelan territory. In the present trouble, England is again a claimant, jointly with Germany, in demands of another character. But in order to make the situation clear, a brief explanation is necessary.

Venezuela is a country fruitful in revolutions, each successive outbreak draining the republic of its resources and leaving it unable to meet its just obligations. This was the condition of the national finances when President Cipriano Castro's government lately announced the suppression, after months of exhaustive struggle, of the rebellion led by General Matos. It was said that there were European interests which would have benefited by the fall of Castro, who is a dictator of an aggressive type, though brave and patriotic and the idol of the lower classes in Venezuela. It was known, too, that the rebels had been helped by shipments of arms from England and elsewhere. Now, however, the dictator was uppermost and the trouble came from a new quarter. Germany and Great Britain each made formal demands upon the republic. German capitalists had invested many millions in constructing a railroad from Caracas, the capital, to La Guayra, the nearest seaport, and bonds had been issued to secure this investment, bearing seven per cent. interest, and guaranteed by the government of the republic. Venezuela defaulted, and the bondholders consented to a reduction of interest to five per cent., but even this was not paid. During the Matos rebellion, the railroad suffered and its plant was almost ruined. Besides this bonded indebtedness, Germany claimed substantial damages for violence to her subjects, interference with German shipping, and also for gross insults to the German flag and to her officials in Venezuela. Great Britain's claim was of a similar nature, and included the unpaid interest on bonds of the Puerto Cabello railroad (built with British capital), and damages to the road. Several British merchant vessels had been interfered with, and one, at least, was seized and compelled to lower her flag. The British Consul had been driven from his office by a riotous mob. The total claims aggregated $30,000,000.

Of course Venezuela, being practically bankrupted by the last rebellion, could not pay, and the two powers, making common cause, decided upon joint action against Castro's government. Official notification was received at Washington of the intentions of the allies to blockade Venezuelan ports, collect customs, and exact guarantees sufficient to cover the amount of their claims. Both governments, however, through their representatives in Washington, gave assurance to our State Department that they had no design of invading or occupying Venezuelan territory. These assurances were regarded as a full and satisfactory recognition of the Monroe doctrine, which establishes the principle that no foreign power shall be permitted to acquire territory on this continent. That doctrine has proved an effectual barrier to European aggression; but in recent years there have been indications of a desire on the part of certain foreign powers to test its efficacy. It was necessary, therefore, that any warlike movements against Venezuela by foreign powers should be closely watched.

It was an open secret that an alliance, for the purpose of forcing Venezuela to a settlement, had been concluded between Germany and England, on the occasion of the Kaiser's recent visit to King Edward. This, the English press intimated, had been the real object of Emperor William's visit. Many people in England were dissatisfied with the new alliance, being afraid that it might lead to a rupture of the friendly relations between Great Britain and this country. It was felt that possibilities might arise which would involve the United States in an international quarrel, and preparations were made to provide for such an emergency. Admiral Dewey, with the largest and strongest fleet of American warships ever assembled, was in Caribbean waters, and his plans were arranged with a view to possible contingencies. His vessels were so disposed that they could reach the scene of operations quickly.

Sooner than expected, the allies' plan of operations was disclosed. In the second week in December, a fleet of British and German warships arrived at Puerto Cabello, and began preparations for a blockade. The German vessels were the Vineta, Falke, Panther, and Gazelle; the British the Indefatigable, Ariadne, and Charybdis. An ultimatum was served upon Castro's government. On December 15, a Caracas despatch reported that the Venezuelan warships Crespo and Tutomo had been sunk by the German cruiser Panther. The German and English colonies in Caracas were panic-stricken, and their legations being closed, they appealed for protection to United States Minister Bowen, who reopened the British Legation, hoisted the Stars

But still more startling events were at hand. As the British cruiser Charybdis lay near the German cruiser Vineta off Puerto Cabello, the captain of the British schooner Topaze, then in the harbor, visited the English warship, and informed Admiral Montgomerie that his vessel had been seized by a Venezuelan mob, the British flag lowered and dishonored and he and his crew expelled from the ship. Fifty marines from the Charybdis were sent to retake the schooner and restore her to the command of her captain. Then a message was sent to the authorities at Puerto Cabello, demanding, within two hours satisfaction for the insult to the flag. The authorities communicated the message to President Castro at Caracas, who authorized them to give ample satisfaction; but the concession came too late. Both the Charybdis and Vineta opened fire on the fortress, throwing 600 shells each. Fort Solano was demolished, and the Charybdis, after the shelling, sent a force of marines ashore, occupied Castle Libertador and took the Governor of the castle a prisoner.

This news created intense excitement both here and in Europe, and convinced the American people that what was at first expected to be nothing more serious than a "pacific blockade," had suddenly become something very like real war, if indeed war had not actually begun. It was reported, too, that the Venezuelans, infuriated at the action of the allies, were arming to resist invasion. Captures of vessels along the Venezuelan coast continued. England began to realize that matters had gone further than she had intended, and the British press severely criticised the government for being dragged into war. In this country feeling ran high, and there was a strong feeling of sympathy with Venezuela. Then came the news that Italy had joined the allies, and despatched the warship Giovanni Bausan to co-operate. Spain, Belgium, Holland, and even little Denmark, were reported as making preparations to send ships to exact reparation from the harassed republic. It seemed like a gathering of eagles over the stricken prey.

Amid all this turmoil abroad, there was evidence of an eager desire to learn the attitude and probable action of the United States. There were rumors of American intervention; but these were not justified by the instructions to Minister Bowen, who was only authorized to act as a mediator, if Venezuela so requested and the allies agreed. He was not to take the initiative. Castro had already sent to the allies an offer of arbitration, but it was ignored. Mean-

DONKEYS AS CARRIERS

STATUE OF WASHINGTON IN CARACAS

COLLAPSE OF THE DOUKHOBOR PILGRIMAGE

FOR a couple of years or more after their arrival in Canada, the Doukhobors applied themselves vigorously to the work of settlement. Their possessions of stock and implements steadily increased, spacious log-houses took the place of the first turf huts, good wages were obtained by the younger men at outside work on farm and railway. They refused to register their births, marriages and deaths, urging that "as God knew all about it, there was no need for the government to bother with it," and they also refused to make legal entry for their homesteads, on the ground that private property in land is wrong, and that they could, therefore, only accept land as a community, and not as individuals. But these objections were regarded as misunderstandings, which time and patience would clear away. Registration was not enforced, and the period within which they must homestead the land temporarily reserved for them—or forfeit the opportunity—was extended by the Canadian Government.

All hopes of Doukhobor prosperity were rudely disturbed when a section of some two thousand members of the colony discarded their live-stock, virtually flinging prosperity away. Last October, they left their homes—men, wives and children, old grandfathers and sick women—and started on a fanatical pilgrimage, which astonished the world, and which was finally put an end to by some measure of official force.

Arriving in Canada (in response to an invitation from the Doukhobors, to start an English school for them), only a couple of weeks before the "pilgrimage" started, I waited for the return of the men, to learn from them their aims and views. The man who has most clearly explained to me the doctrines of the Pilgrims, is Nikolai Zibaroff, a prominent leader among them. He was accounted one of the most capable and intelligent Douk-hobors, and his sincerity and earnestness are undoubted.

I learned that the movement had its rise in two or three villages of the "South Colony," the Doukhobor Settlement lying out from Yorkton, Assiniboia. First, in the spring, came the movement against the use of domestic animals. The idea spread, until over 500 head of stock—horses, cows, oxen and sheep—were gathered together, driven to a wilderness miles from settled country, and there given "their proper liberty," and "rendered back to the Lord." Wolves devoured some of the sheep, but as soon as possible, the government took charge of the animals and sold them.

Next, the Doukhobors discarded all animal products save their woollen garments. Sheepskin coats, boots, and harness were gathered into huge heaps on the prairie, and either fired, or left for government agents or passing travelers. Pillows were ripped open and the feathers destroyed or scattered by the wind; bone or pearl buttons were carefully cut off their clothing and cast away. Men and women hitched themselves to ploughs, or toiled with spades, wagons laden with flour were dragged twenty to fifty miles by teams of human beings.

It was the middle of October, when the Indian Summer of the Canadian Northwest was mellowing to its close, that the climax came. From the same villages where started the no-animal crusade, a few men began preaching the desertion of home and work and the consecration of life to "a pilgrimage for Jesus." All money was to be given up, rendered to Caesar, as represented by the immigration agent. Men were to leave all, and go work for Jesus. The Lord would provide for them. If only they would have faith, the preachers said, the winter would not come, but, instead, a second summer.

The success of the message was dramatic. Within ten days the round of the fifty odd villages had been made, and some seventeen hundred souls started on the pilgrimage. Arriving at Yorkton, at which place many ate their first food—except for rose-berries—in three days. Government officials and police separated the women and children from the party, fearing the results of exposure. The men continued on their way, some few preaching in broken English, when they came to a town. The cold weather had come, and while they generally obtained food and shelter at night, sometimes these were not forthcoming, and they suffered keenly. But they kept on until, about 200 miles from Yorkton, they were stopped by the police, put on a special train by main force, and brought home again. There they took the position that, being brought home against their wills, the government of Canada must provide for them during the winter. So a bargain has been struck: the "Pilgrim" Doukhobors agree to remain in the villages during the winter (stating, however, their intention to start on pilgrimage again in spring) and to give up to the government all their stock of grain. In return for this the government will supply them with flour and coal-oil, and provide teams and men to bring in wood.

A conversation I had with Nikolai Zibaroff shows the unsubstantiality of the view of the main body of "Pilgrims."

"We went out to fulfil the Commandments of God," he said. "What Commandments? First, to love God. We cannot see God's face, therefore we should love the earth and all animals he has made—everything in the world. That is what is meant by the First Commandment. The Second Commandment is to love men—our neighbors as ourselves. That is to say, we should march in all the world and let every man know there should be a new life. If a man does not march he cannot fulfil the law of God."

"So we gave liberty to all our animals according to Romans 8: 19-22. I should show love to everything, because my life is very short. Perhaps the end of the world may come to-morrow. You say that giving proper liberty, our sheep were really giving liberty to the wolves to eat them. We hoped the

Moment by Moment

IN the natural world the eternal God puts himself under the conditions of time and space. When he is to do anything, he does it only moment by moment. He will only fill up the ocean drop by drop; he will only pile up the earth atom by atom. You must have been greatly impressed with this idea if you have ever visited one of those vast underground regions like the Luray Caverns in Virginia, or the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky, and gazed upon a huge stalagmite, or pillar of limestone, like the great trunk of a tree, formed on the floor of the cave by the slow falling of single drops of water from the roof. What ages it must have taken to deposit that enormous pillar—long ages drawn out minute by minute, drop by drop.

We have learned at school that plants and animals are produced cell by cell, and that our own bodily life can grow only by the smallest increments. We live from moment to moment only; our life is just a succession of heart beats. And in our physical body we are dying not only daily, but moment by moment. Every movement of our body—every action of muscle or nerve, every emotion, every thought of our brain, involves the death of some particle or other of which the body is composed; and this loss has to be repaired just as constantly by the formation of new particles. Thus God keeps us in natural life, and provides for the exercise of all physical and mental faculties only moment by moment.

In just the same way God ministers to our spiritual life—not by fits and starts, on great occasions, but moment by moment. He carries on the work of grace within us by a process of slow increments, through the real constant presence and never-ceasing operation of the Holy Spirit. There is no storing-up of grace for future emergencies. We get the grace at the moment we require it, and the help in the time of need. The promises of his Fatherly love go no further than that.

The Rescue of Venezuela

NOW that the acute stage of the Venezuelan trouble is past—the whole question having been relegated to arbitration—we can look back with calmer minds upon the peril which threatened to involve this country in a serious international dispute.

View it as generously as we may, the incident is capable of only one construction. South America has long been regarded by the European governments as a fair and attractive prize for colonial exploitation. Envious eyes have been fascinated by the richness and abundance of its resources; and the spent and overcrowded countries of the Old World saw, in the group of comparatively weak and unprotected Southern republics, a means of relieving themselves of their own superfluous population, of replenishing the depleted imperial exchequers, and of winning fresh laurels for their flags.

With all their boasted civilization, the kingdoms of Europe are to-day swayed by the same predatory instincts that were the distinguishing mark of their ancestors in mediæval times. Those fierce old wars of aggression and conquest, spurred on by sheer love of plunder and battle, have their modern parallel. Who can forget the hideous scramble among the European nations over the partition of Africa, which they dismembered in quick order, a few years ago? And it seems but yesterday that these same powers were engaged in a great international game of grab in the plucking of China, some of whose fairest provinces still remain in their hands.

Venezuela is merely an incident, but it indicates infallibly that the thought of Europe turns toward the West. But our forefathers, foreseeing that, sooner or later, the attempt would be made by Europe to disrupt the young Western Continent, wisely took measures to prevent the spoliation of American territory. It was to forestall such efforts by Europe or by any foreign power whatsoever, that the famous Monroe Doctrine was adopted. That doctrine, plainly defined, means that no European power, or combination of European powers, shall be permitted to forcibly deprive an American State of the right and power of self-government, or seize and occupy its territory. From that principle the United States can never recede, and this has been made sufficiently clear to England, Germany, and the other governments of Europe in the present instance.

The South American States may not be ideal States. With all their wars, revolutions, and frequent disturbances, they are like a band of unruly youngsters, whose lusty tugging and brawling make the nursery a perpetual pandemonium; but they are growing up through it all, and from the tumult, and stress, and struggle, they will sooner or later rise to the full stature and dignity of enlightened and progressive republican manhood. Shall they be left a prey to the colonizing schemes of the kings and cabinets of Europe, to be converted, perhaps, at no distant day, into formidable foes of the republican principle, and of the American republic in particular? No. They may give trouble occasionally now, but they are heading in the right direction after all, and under the protecting ægis of the northern republic they will continue to grow and to fulfil their destiny, unmolested by any foreign power. To accomplish this, and to convince Europe that the Monroe Doctrine is not an obsolete political curio, a relic of old-fashioned statesmanship, but a living principle, that doctrine must be revitalized with all the power, energies and resources at our command, until Europe shall recognize it as a bulwark against foreign aggression—a strong safeguard for every free and independent State on this side of the world.

It would be well for Venezuela, and other States liable to be similarly situated, to remember that the Monroe Doctrine was not framed to shield swindling governments from the consequences of their irregularities. Without national honor, there can be no enduring prosperity, and the evasion of just obligations is an offense before all nations, that must ultimately overwhelm the offender with confusion and disaster, involving, if not loss of territory, penalties scarcely less severe. Foreign investors claim, doubtless with truth, that they have been duped by Venezuela, and that government will now be compelled to give guarantees for payment to the uttermost, in liquidation of all reasonable claims. Furthermore, it will necessarily have to forego revolutions, live at peace with itself and its neighbors, practise economy, and respect the rights of foreigners. President Castro's arrogant dictatorship, the popular love of disturbance, and the insecurity of life and property, especially of foreigners, have brought the republic to the verge of ruin. It has been rescued, not because of any merit of its own, but solely through the influence of the Monroe Doctrine, which forced back the hand of the spoiler, even when it had grasped its prey.

The Prohibition Vote in Canada

SYMPATHY and congratulation are alike due to the Prohibitionists of Ontario, on the result of their gallant struggle for the exclusion of the liquor traffic from the Province. As explained in this journal, at the time the act prohibiting the sale of liquor was passed by the Provincial Legislature, the law needed the approval of the people to make it effective. Nor were the legislators willing to accept a mere majority as an indication of the popular will. They stipulated that the act should not go into force unless the number of votes cast in its favor was greater than one half the total vote polled in the election of 1898. That meant that the Act should not become a law unless 212,739 votes were cast in its favor. At the time of writing, the figures from outlying districts have not been received, but sufficient is known to make it evident that the Prohibitionists have been defeated. About 170,000 votes were cast in favor of the Act, which is about 43,000 less than was required to make it effective.

The liquor-dealers are doubtless rejoicing in this victory; but an analysis of the figures shows that they may wisely rejoice with trembling. The latest returns at hand show a majority of 80,528 in favor of Prohibition. The fact that of all the voters polled, nearly two-thirds were opposed to the traffic, is an omen that no one interested in it can afford to disregard. But even this gross division does not tell its full significance. The most notable feature of the vote is that of the growth of Prohibition sentiment in the great cities, where an anti-Prohibition vote might have been expected. Toronto gave a majority of 1,531 for Prohibition. Seven other large cities also gave Prohibition majorities aggregating

3,883. In the seven other large cities which did give majorities in favor of retaining the traffic they were small. The fifteen cities, averaged together, gave a total majority for Prohibition of 2,294. Had the weather on the day of polling been favorable, so that the country people could have traveled, the vote for Prohibition would have been much larger.

Too much cannot be said in commendation of the vigor with which the Prohibitionists conducted the campaign. The pulpit, the platform and the press were all enlisted on their side. They did their utmost; they did nobly, and even in their defeat they have cause for hope.

Present-Day Methods

IF, by any means, the masses can be induced to attend church, the sincere Christian will rejoice, and he will not be fastidious about the methods employed, if only they are in harmony with Christian principles. It is doubtful, however, whether some of the methods adopted are such as merit unqualified approval. The church is not a club, nor a theatre, nor will people learn the way of salvation from playing at bowls or billiards, or from lectures on science and travel. It is right that the church should help the people to better and higher culture, and should show its sympathy with the dreary lot of the poor, by giving them elevating entertainment on week-days; but its first duty is to preach the Gospel, which alone can save the soul, and that righteousness which makes men honest. A vigorous plea for this old-time principle is found among the reminiscences of the late Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, in the report of one of his talks, furnished by one who listened to it. The humorous preacher called it "A Postscript to the Acts of the Apostles." Dr. Parker said:

Now, when Paul had come into the city of London, he went into the synagogues of the Christians, and viewed with amazement the modern apparatus for converting the masses. Remembering Antioch and Athens, Ephesus and Corinth, Iconium and Pamphylia, he was stunned into momentary silence by the miracles of manipulated evolution. "It was not so seen in Lystra," said he, in tones blurred by emotion. "In Antioch and Syria and Cilicia we had no pleasant Sunday afternoons, with solos by Madame Vox; and no mission premises, with smoking-rooms and billiard-tables; and no regiments and brigades, with resounding bands and flying banners; but if by such means ye can do good to any human soul, then be steadfast, immovable always abounding in the work of the Lord. My record was in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labors, in watchings and fastings, but as ye have fallen on sunnier times, beware lest the softness of the climate reduce the pith of your muscle."

And Paul, standing on the steps of the cathedral, called by his name, himself unspeakably grander than the sacred pile, exclaimed in a loud voice, "Ye men of London, I perceive with all your sagacity, you may be putting your money into bags with holes in them; for as I passed by I beheld old men whose work was done, young people in view of the wedding day, working men addicted to sobriety and thrift, hastening to entrust their savings to men who wore the Christian livery. In old time I preached of righteousness, temperance, judgment to come, until wicked men trembled because the pains of hell gat hold upon them; and were I to return permanently to the ministries of earth, I should take up the same grand themes, and at the risk of making some men's Sunday afternoons intolerably unpleasant, I would cry aloud, and spare not, 'Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings, cease to do evil, learn to do well, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. What doth the Lord thy God require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?' " And the great voice ceased, and men cried mightily to God for the return of apostolic preaching; and men who had been guilty of bringing robbery for burnt offerings hung their heads in humiliation and shame.

From a Friend in Turkey

Dr. Klopsch—My Dear Brother in Christ:—I read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is the only comfort and enjoyment of our home among all other papers which we have. My poor English and our words seem powerless to describe our gratitude for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We look always with an eager eye, mail after mail, for our favorite paper. It is the only paper in our family from the year '94, and we never regret for our subscriptions, and we have in mind to cut off many of our necessary expenses and not to leave our paper at all, which is the comfort of our home. I am sorry that the people of this city are not familiar with the language. When I received the Red Letter Bible, everybody admired it in my church. (REV.) C. PAPADOPOULOS, Pastor of the Protestant Congregation of Fatsa, Turkey.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Welcome to the Healer

SELDOM has any foreign visitor to our shores received so genuine and cordial a welcome as that accorded to Dr. Lorenz, the great Austrian surgeon.

As previously mentioned in these columns, the direct cause of his visit was an invitation, with appropriate consideration, from Mr. Armour, of Chicago, to come and operate on Mr. Armour's little daughter, who was afflicted with congenital dislocation of the hip. After the operation, for which Dr. Lorenz received a fee commensurate with his eminence in his profession, he traveled across the continent to California, and back to New York. In each city at which he stayed, he performed operations on poor children afflicted as was the Armour child, in no case accepting any fee. He was glad to have other surgeons watch his work, and courteously explained to them his principles and methods, so that when he has left our land, they, too, may give relief in the same way to the poor cripples. In New York his reception was enthusiastic. Dr. Hibbs, the famous surgeon of the Orthopedic Hospital, Dr. Gibney, Dr. Ashley, and other surgeons have long used the same methods, but they were glad to have the opportunity of seeing an acknowledged master in the art perform the difficult operations. Every day for a week Dr. Lorenz went from one hospital to another, little crippled children being there waiting for him to heal them. One of them, a poor girl with two club feet, the malformation of which was so extreme that she could stand only on her insteps, was so deftly handled by the great surgeon that in a few minutes he raised her, and, as he said, "she stood erect flat on her feet." This, too, without the use of the knife, and only by his great skill in manipulation. A volley of applause from the hundreds of surgeons and students who witnessed the triumph told Dr. Lorenz how highly his operation was admired by the men who knew its difficulty. Hundreds of crippled children were brought by their parents to be treated, but the operation was so exhausting to the doctor that only a few could be operated on, and Dr. Lorenz selected the worst cases. It is a pity that people who need spiritual healing are not similarly anxious to put themselves in the hands of the Divine Physician, who is omnipotent.

He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might he increaseth strength (Isa. 40: 29).

Self-Sacrifice for a Child

A despatch to the New York Times from Omaha, Neb., tells of a touching act of kindness on the part of a lady to a suffering child. During the recent bitter weather, the wife of a well-known citizen was on a surface car on her way downtown. On the opposite side of the car was a workingman with a young baby in his arms; the child was poorly clad, and seemed to be half frozen. The lady looked on pityingly for a few minutes, and then arose from her seat and calmly removed her silk petticoat, then, walking down the aisle, she asked the man's permission to wrap the garment around the infant. He made no objection, and she tenderly took the young baby in her arms and wrapped the warm, soft petticoat around it, then laid it back in the father's arms. Then she quietly took her seat again, the admiring, approving gaze of every person in the car resting on her. The lady could probably have better spared a gift of money; but money could not have given the child the prompt relief and comfort that were necessary to save its life. Her gift, therefore, was the wise gift, and perhaps her heart would be so warmed by making it, that she would not miss the warmth of the garment she gave away.

Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble (Psalm 41: 1).

His Wealth Fatal

A remarkable case of drowning was reported to the coroner in Brooklyn, N.Y., last week. The owner of a sloop in that city has been making considerable money during the coal famine by going to Communipaw, N.J., where loads of coal from the mines are delivered, loading the sloop with coal and selling it to dealers in Brooklyn. A few days ago he made another trip, arrived safely and sold the coal at a good figure. The purchaser stipulated that he should pay a part of the amount in silver dollars. The captain filled his pockets overtake an honest man in the pursuit of his business; but much more grievous is it when the possession of money drags a man down into worldliness and sin, by which he loses not his life, but his soul.

No Perfect Counterfeit

A singular fact that our psychical experts would do well to study, is noted by Mr. William P. Hazen, formerly chief of the United States Secret Service. It is, that the best forgers and counterfeiters confess to some power operating on them in their work, causing them to blunder. An engraver who can make a perfect plate when working honestly, is incapable of doing so when perpetrating a fraud. One of the most expert engravers that ever turned out a counterfeit bill in this country, confessed that when he imitated the two-dollar Window bill, he made five plates. Discovering an error in the first plate, he made a second, in which that error was corrected, but another was made. He made a third, a fourth and a fifth plate, yet in each there was an error. He simply could not help it, he said, so long as he was at the crooked work. His last error, that is, the one on the last of the five plates, was in the Treasury numbers. In that, the "8" was not uniform with the rest of the numerals. So throughout the series of plates, he would correct one error only to make another, and no effort would save him from making one. The counterfeiter attributed it to the power of conscience. We have been told by the great dramatist that conscience doth make cowards of us all; but these facts seem to show that it

He wrote to them regularly for some time, but eventually his letters ceased to come. His wife learned that he had received a much larger sum in England than they had expected, and presumed he was staying to enjoy his money. Other reports reached her ears which convinced her he did not intend to return. She therefore set to work to earn a living for her young family. She obtained employment, and, in addition, started a boarding-house. Soon she was fairly prosperous. A few weeks ago, her husband presented himself at her house, and was astonished at being refused admittance. He pleaded and promised, but without avail. He called every day, but his wife was adamant. Unknown to him, however, his persistent calling was softening her heart. Finally, she told a neighbor that she had relented, and that the next time he called she would take him back. On the next day she waited at home for his usual visit, but he did not come. She made inquiries about him and learned that he had set out as usual for her home, but had turned into a saloon on the way, and though later in the day he had come to her gate he did not enter, but went away. Her heart hardened again towards him, and at the next visit she told him positively and finally that never more would she own him as her husband. How chagrined that man must feel that he should have turned away on the very day that his wife was prepared to grant his desire! Who can tell how often seeking souls have similarly missed the opportunity of making their peace with God?

Again he limiteth a certain day, saying: To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts (Heb. 4: 7).

The Evangelical Alliance makes its usual announcement of topics for the Week of Prayer, which in 1903 covers the eight days embracing Sunday, January 4, and Sunday, January 11. The texts which are suggested to pastors for their sermons on the former day are Isaiah 64: 1, 2, and Psalms 85: 6. For the latter day Isaiah 65: 24, and I. Peter 4: 7 are suggested. The following list of prayer topics for the intervening week-days is offered to the churches: Monday, the church militant; Tuesday, foreign missions; Wednesday, home missions; Thursday, special work among the young—also families and schools; Friday, nations and their rulers; Saturday, the Gospel ministry, including pastors, teachers, and evangelists.

For an Aged Friend

Dear "Christian Herald":—I must write to tell you, that I think both the Red Letter Bible and the Art Gallery are fine. The Red Letter Bible is the handsomest book I ever saw for the money. The one I have received will make such a beautiful present for an aged friend of mine. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for several years; it seems as if we couldn't get along without it. Portsmouth, O. W. C. BROUSE.

CHRISTIAN LIVING

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JAN. 11.
PHILIP 4: 1-13

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—PHILIP 4: 4:
"REJOICE IN THE LORD ALWAYS"

LIVELY interest centres around letters and letter-carriers. Especially at this season, when a gift has been sent and words of appreciation are expected. So it was long ago in Philippi. Those who had been won to Christ in that city through the teaching of the Apostle Paul, including the households of Lydia and the jailer, had sent Paul a gift of money. The occasion for such a gift was, that Paul was a prisoner at Rome, and in need. "His own hired house" was his prison; and there was, therefore, rent to pay and necessities of life to provide.

But Paul was not free to earn his living. With loving hearts, in memory of all that Paul had suffered in prison for the Gospel's sake in their own city, the Christians of Philippi, Jewish and Gentile, made up a purse to send to the beloved prisoner. The carrying of it was entrusted to one of their most worthy members, Epaphroditus. He had a long journey to take by land and sea, that consumed days and weeks. Probably he carried the treasure in a leather girdle, tightly bound about him, never loosed day or night. How rejoiced he must have been to come at last into the presence of Paul, and pour out the treasure before him as the offering of loving hearts! He found Paul in his own house, guarded by a Roman soldier, to whom he was sometimes chained, but he was free to write and meet his friends. The writers of this lesson have seen that house in Rome. Though it was then above ground, one now goes below two churches, built one above the other, to find the house. Above it has gathered the dust of centuries, and buried the house and the first church built above it. The Church of Santa Maria via Lata, is the name of the church now above ground, on this spot where Paul wrote the Epistle of our lesson and others—that are full of joy, though he wrote in chains and in anticipation of execution—a beautiful illustration of our golden text.

"It is time for his return," the people began to say to each other, as they thought of how long Epaphroditus had been gone, and one day a ship landed at Neapolis, on which Epaphroditus was a passenger. He had a journey of eight or ten miles to make on foot before reaching Philippi. Pressed close against his heart was the precious letter which Paul had written to the Christians in Philippi. It was written on parchment, and rolled up. "Epaphroditus has come, and he has brought a letter from Paul," was the word joyfully passed around among the Christians. And they gathered together to hear it read. Never were sweeter words penned. He calls them his "joy and his crown, his dearly beloved." He refers to their gift as "an odor of a sweet smell, a sacrifice well pleasing to God." And he notes that this was not the first time that they had so dealt with him. The letter is filled with loving confidence in their well-doing, and at the same time it calls them to higher things, to "whatsoever things are pure, true, lovely, and of good report." A peculiar tenderness was given to the letter by including Timothy, "his son in the faith," with himself in its authorship. Timothy had been with him in Philippi, and doubtless by his faith and his devotion to Paul, had made many friends among the Christians there. It was a love letter from these two pastors to a church they loved like a bride, "even as Christ loved the church."

The letter ought to be read with special interest by all Europeans and their descendants, as it is addressed to the first European Christian church, when Europe was the chief missionary field. It is but fair that Europeans and their descendants should now pass on the missionary message to other races. And the conversion of Europe from pagan cruelty and heathen barbarism should be used at home as one of the greatest evidences of the divine power of Christianity.

Illustration and Application

Paul unconsciously enumerates the elements of his own glad and heroic Christian manhood, in the inspired counsels to converts which constitute our lesson—especially timely at this season, when pastors and teachers have so many converts to counsel. If we move from verse to verse asking, "What virtue is here named?" we shall find those named below, and at each should linger to ask and answer also two other questions, "What is its nature?" and "Do I possess it?" Ten virtues of thought and word and deed Paul urges on that first European Church, which he had founded and fostered: 1. Brotherly love (v. 1); 2. Unity of spirit (v. 1); 3. Mutual helpfulness (v. 3); 4. Divine gladness (v. 4); 5. Forbearance (v. 5); 6. Rock-firm God-trust (vv. 6, 7); 7. High thinking (v. 8); 8. Exemplary action (v. 9); 9. Contentment (vv. 10-12); 10. Spiritual power (v. 13).

Dearly-beloved.—Six endearing terms in one verse attest the reality of Paul's love of the brethren, the badge by which Jesus said His followers were to be known. Sometimes, but too seldom, we find churches where this badge is seen on every side, where all are like one loving family; but in too many churches "dearly-beloved" is but a fossil of the wonderful fraternity of rich and poor in the early church that made the heathen, from their "world without love," exclaim, "See how these Christians love one another!" The relation of a Sunday School teacher to his class should be so fatherly or brotherly that each could greet the other with the heartfelt words, "Dearly-beloved and longed for, my joy and crown."

Stand fast in the Lord. At one of the Bull Run battles of the American Civil War, a Confederate general said to his troops: "See Jackson's men; they stand like a stone wall."

A Federal battery had unlimbered its guns right in front of them, but they stood fast, inspired by the steadfastness of their commander, who was ever afterward known as Stone-wall Jackson. Many a Christian in the army knows that it is not so hard to stand the bullets at the hour of battle, as to stand the bootjacks at the hour of prayer. It was at the close of a Sunday evening service at the Winchester Soldiers' Home, in England, that the clear, beautiful eyes of a little bugler boy looked longingly into the face of Miss Perks, as he asked: "Can I be a Christian?" "Why do you want to be a Christian?" she asked. Pointing to the man who had brought the young bugler to the meeting, had been converted at the Home some time before. For two years he had lived a witness for Jesus among his comrades in the barracks, where he won the respect of officers and men, and young Martin had been placed under his especial care. Miss Perks prayed with the bugler boy, and showed him from God's Word how fully the Saviour had atoned for his sins. And there on his knees Martin gave himself to Jesus, to be saved and kept. But soon Miss Perks was surprised to see tears in his eyes. Could he be already repenting his choice? "What is it, Martin?" she asked. "You are not sorry that you have trusted Jesus and become his soldier, are you?" "Oh, no, miss," he replied earnestly. "But—it's the boots and the belts, I was thinking of." He had heard of cowardly scoffers throwing such things at comrades who had the courage to kneel by their beds, and for a moment his heart failed him. A fine, tall old man, an artilleryman, who was standing by, put his arm around the lad, and said cheerily: "All right, chummy, never you fear; I've had 'em, but I didn't mind the boots and belts; it was the spurs I was most afraid of."

"The spurs!" echoed Martin, looking up at his would-be comforter. "What did you do?" "Why, I just asked Jesus not to let them stick." "And didn't they?" "No, never." Cheered by the assurance, and with Jesus as his Protector, the young recruit went forth to the fight. On Monday, he appeared at the Home, unwounded; and more, he had captured a prisoner. "Well, did any boots come?" asked Miss Perks. "No, miss, not one. And if you please"—with a bright smile—"I have brought the corporal to-night, because I do want him to be saved, too." "It's all through the boy, miss," said the prisoner, "that I have come. I am corporal in his room, and years ago I promised my mother not to neglect prayer. But I did neglect it, and when I saw him come in and kneel last night it fairly shamed me, and I told the fellows the first one who threw a boot at him I would report." Ere long, the two had recruited fifteen comrades for the army of Christ. The army is not the only place where steadfastness is put to the test. Kipling, in Mulholland's Contract, tells of a home missionary who had as hard a place:

An' I spoke to God of our Contract, and he says to my prayer:
"I never put on my ministers no more than they can bear,
So back you go to the cattle-boats, an' preach my Gospel there."

I didn't want to do it, for I knew what I should get,
And I wanted to preach religion, handsome an' out of the wet,
But the Word of the Lord were laid on me, an' I done what I was set.

It is a good time to talk of steadfastness in the second week of the new year, when the diary we started, the new leaf we turned over, and the good resolutions we made on New Year's day, are already in danger from our weakening purposes.

Be of the same mind in the Lord.

—This calls us to unity of spirit, not to monotony of opinion. "In essentials amity, in non-essentials liberty, in all things charity." In this Philippian church the only jarring note was the unpleasantness between Euodias and Syntyche. Commentators have guessed that one held woman's meetings of Jewish Christians and the other a rival meeting of Gentile Christians. We are not to lose faith in Christianity in any age because church members are not all in accord, only let us see to it that we have no part in breaking the unity of spirit that is so essential to success. Oftener than anything else it is saying what had better have been left unsaid that breaks the unity.

The Idleness Train will take you down

In just an hour or so.

"Lock your lips, children," is one of the exercises of a good kindergarten. How much trouble it would save if, whenever we are tempted to speak unfavorably of another we should quickly ask, "Is it true? Is it kind? Is it necessary?" and, unless we could say "Yes" to all three, would give the order to ourselves, "Lock your lips."

Fellow-laborers whose names are in the book of life.—Paul, having spoken of two women at variance, refers to the great helpfulness of the other women who were workers, about whom and Clement, who was also a worker, he bids the whole church to rally in active service. Indirectly, he reminds idle church members that having their names on the church books is not enough. They must be on "the book of life," and it is only by a real Christian life, only by becoming "fellow-laborers," they can secure enrollment there. That members of the church, regular in observance of its forms and orthodox in creed, will nevertheless miss the reward if they do not put their religion into life, is proclaimed again and again in the Bible (Matt. 7: 26, 27). Those who selfishly aim at happiness usually miss it, while those who aim at helpfulness achieve both.

Some one asked a lady, who had peculiar success in raising flowers that were both beautiful and abundant, to disclose the secret of it all. "Oh," she replied, "my flowers bloom profusely because I am continually cutting them off and giving them away."

Mr. W. D. Howells recently replied to the question whether his present definition of happiness is the same that it was when he was a lad in an Ohio village, thus: "It is quite different. I have come to see life, not as the chase of a forever impossible personal happiness, but as a greed for endeavor toward the happiness of the whole human family. There is no other success."

The Thoughtless Road is a popular route,

And most folks start that way;

But it's steep down a grade; if you don't look out,

You'll land in Falsehood Bay.

You glide through the valley of Vicious Talk,

And into the Tunnel of Hate;

Then, crossing the Add-to Bridge, you walk

Right into the city gate.

The White House New Year's Reception Programme

THE New Year's reception at the White House on Thursday will be an event of unusual interest. For the first time, all of the main and ground floors of the remodeled mansion will be thrown open to the public, and their capacity for accommodating a reception crowd tested. The diplomatists and their families will drive through the grounds and alight at a door beneath the south porch, which opens into a large oval apartment directly under the Blue Parlor. This was formerly one of the store-rooms of the basement. It has been remodeled into a luxurious receiving chamber. The friends of the President's family who will attend the reception, will come into the house through the north door. The east colonade, which is now to become the main and official entrance of the White House, bring down one of the daughters of the Cabinet, who will not take a place in the line but back of it, with the other young girls of that circle; Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Hitchcock; and the Secretary of Agriculture with his attractive daughter, who presides as hostess of his household. In the rear will come Miss Alice Roosevelt and a bevy of other pretty girls who will be behind the line, to assist in entertaining the distinguished guests. On account of the recent death of Mrs. Root's father, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Root will not appear at any of the official functions this winter.

costume of Colonel of the Red Hussars, with Frau von Scherk, the lovely wife of the Forestry Expert of embassy; Comte Cassini, Russia's Ambassador, with his handsome daughter and her friend, Mlle. des Planques; the Mexican Ambassador, with Senora de Aspiroz and his official household, will have the third place, while Italy's Ambassador and Signora des Planches will have the fourth.

Britain's Ambassador, Sir Michael Herbert, with Lady Herbert and suite, will follow the Italian delegation. Sir Michael will wear the brilliantly decorated court dress of knighthood. The new Ambassador from Austria-Hungary, Baron Hengelmuller, who received the promotion to his high position during December, comes next, in flaming red velvet cloak, knee trousers, high top boots, and long, white plumed chawill be used for the first time. Guests will pass through the colonnade into the basement, or ground floor, and thence into the waiting or dressing rooms on the north and south sides of the wide hall. These were the laundries and billiard rooms, but have been transformed into elegant chambers, each with its toilet boudoirs.

The changes inside the house which will awaken the most attention at this New Year's reception will be the stairs on the east, and the enlarged state dining-room on the west. When the guests have removed their wraps in the dressing-rooms on the ground floor, they will pass out into the wide hall which runs its full length. This hall has been tinted a light French gray, and it will be made as bright as day by the hundreds of electric bulbs which outline the frieze. Where the servants' narrow stairs formerly ascended to the second floor a wide stone stairway reaching to the second story has been built. Down these, from the second story, the Presidential party will descend at the call of the bugler, on the stroke of eleven on New Year's morning. The Marine Band will be stationed at the east end of the corridor; another from Fort Meyer at the west, and they will alternate in providing music during the reception.

As the President and Mrs. Roosevelt appear at the head of the stairs, preceded by Master of Ceremonies, Colonel Bingham, and his assistant, Lieutenant McCawley, of the regular army, the Marine Band will strike up, "Hail to the Chief." Following just back of them, and in strict regard to official precedence, will come Secretary of State and Mrs. Hay; Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Shaw; Attorney-General and Mrs. Knox; Postmaster-General and Mrs. Payne; Secretary of the Navy Moody is unmarried, and will probably

This party will cross the corridor to the Blue Parlor, where they will take their accustomed places in line. The first who will be presented to the President and his assistants will be the dean of the corps, Doctor von Hollenben, the German Ambassador, in his striking peau. Last of the diplomats of highest rank to be received will be M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador. He will be accompanied by his American wife and suite. Then will come the ministers of the corps and their retinues, the Brazilians, picturesque in their white trousers, gold lace, and blue waistcoats; the Persian minister, in his long dress coat, almost hidden in gold lace and decorations; the Turks, in red fez; the Chinese Minister, Sir Liang Chan, and sixty or more Chinese in flowing silk robes. President Roosevelt will need an extra hour to pass all of them down the receiving line. Following these come the members of the Supreme Court, the Senators and Representatives, the Army and Navy contingent, the Grand Army, the heads of the departments of the government, the civic organizations of the District, and then the public.

Mrs. Roosevelt's hospitality is most generous. She is a very busy little woman, but she systemizes her time so thoroughly that she accomplishes far more than many of her less busy sisters. Her mornings are loyally devoted to her children and household. Each Tuesday forenoon, she meets the ladies of the Cabinet, and plans with them the social events of the week. Friday afternoons, Mrs. Roosevelt is at home to her personal friends, who, of course, come upon invitation. Frequently, also, there are evening entertainments, musicales, readings, or small receptions. Fortunately for Mrs. Roosevelt, she has a large force of assistants who stand ready to help her in these duties. One of the President's sisters, Mrs. Cowles, lives in Washington, and another, Mrs. Robinson, whose home is in New York, often comes to the capital. Both ladies are prominent in White House social doings.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

SPECIAL NOTICE

On and after Jan. 7, 1903, THE MAIL BAG will be devoted weekly to replying to letters received from readers in all parts of the world. This departure is rendered necessary by the increasing volume of correspondence of this character. Elsewhere in the paper, frequent opportunity will be afforded our readers to unite in a Symposium of opinions on a stated question, dealing with some one of the live topics of the day.

Answers to Question of the Week

Should the intellect be the master or the servant of the emotions?

Repressing the Emotions

Intellect should guide; but the emotional nature should not be subdued till the man is "coldly intellectual." The emotions furnish the impulses for every action, and without them a man would be inert. But let emotion stir him, then it is for his intellect to decide whether the emotion leads to good or bad things. One's aim should be to intelligently act from impulses arising from loving feelings, that thereby those feelings may be strengthened and become dominant; while feelings of the opposite kind may be eventually suppressed by not being permitted to lead to action.

S. A. SAUNDERS.

Neither, a Master

The Creator, in uniting the intellectual and the emotional in man, intended no such relationship as that of master and servant; just as he intended no such relationship in the case of our primal parents in the Garden of Eden. Any such relationship would have been degrading to both. He made the one a whit stronger, but the other a whit finer, so that the two could balance together upon the same board with the fulcrum exactly in the middle. A purely intellectual being could not be a lovable creature, and a purely emotional production could not be a sensible one. A perfect man is not a caricatured image of God. Our Father is infinite in wisdom, and infinite in love—neither quality transcends the other.

C. SPENCER.

Superiority of the Emotions

Sir Walter Raleigh, when led to the block, was asked which way he would have his head lay. He replied it was immaterial which way his head lay, so the heart was right. So it is, that the noblest emotions, or impulses produced by the emotions, will ever overcome the vagaries of the brain. Christian faith owes more to the emotions, than to the logic of the intellect. It rises higher in the world's thought and struggle, because it is founded in human sympathy and love. The Master recognizes the heart as the medium of the emotions: "Blessed are the pure in heart," "He looketh in the heart." Said Jeremiah: "I know thou triest the heart," "My heart trusteth in Him," "With the heart man believeth," "Sanctify your heart in the Lord." These, and many like expressions, convey the fact that the virtues of life are ennobled by the emotions—heart exhalations. In Holy Writ, the mind is an inferior entity, corrupt, carnal, wilful; it is not the receptacle of divine favor for our better nature. We see in the divine Word too plainly, that the attainment of wisdom, virtue, love, cometh only through the heart, and these attributes could not exist through the influence of the mind only. The intellect may entrench itself in majestic periods, imperious, impassioned speech, but in the presence of emotion it is a coward. As a handmaid, it may quicken emotions, it may proclaim, even command, but in the sense of controlling them, it is powerless. It may inflame the passion of love, but it cannot subdue. It may appeal, but it cannot subject the soul of emotion—the "love which passeth knowledge," for no power is greater than this Christian beacon—"God is love."

OLIVER M. WILSON.

The Two are Equal

Neither. It should be as the husband in a well ordered home; the leader and director, in a sense, but not the master. It should direct, and at the same time serve. The man whose intellect is master, is hard and cold and often radically wrong. Where emotions have the mastery, the man is erratic, uncertain, childish. But where the two are truly wed, with the intellect as the strong, steady husband, and with emotion as the sweet and winsome bride, the twain becomes one—a one of power and beauty.

R. T. MANSFIELD.

The Well-Balanced Man

Neither master nor servant. Each has its place; the two ought to work in harmony; and each in some degree regulate and control the other. A man who is wholly intellectual is a stick; and a man who is wholly emotional is an animal. The intellect puts the rein on the emotions, that else might run away with us; and the emotions temper the reason, sometimes even setting it at defiance. In a well-balanced man you could hardly say whether reason or emotion is the more prominent. The late Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, made conscience the supreme authority in man; but conscience is not reason, and it is not emotion, but a compound of both.

JOSEPH HAMILTON.

or reverence ends in bigotry, fanaticism, superstition or idolatry. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life."

M. R. D. DINGWALL.

A Woman's Point of View

The moral sentiments and intellectual faculties should exercise the directing and controlling sway over the emotions, if man would attain the greatest happiness and widest expanse of character. Emotions may be of a character that would prompt one to acts of love and kindness, or they may be such as would lead one to violence and dark deeds. If the gratification sought by any one or more of the sentiments or emotions does not infringe upon the duties prescribed by all the other feelings, and by reason and judgment the action is proper; but even though the emotion be one that in itself is proper and legitimate, and elevating and refining in its influence, the moral and intellectual faculties should sit in judgment upon it, and decide whether its gratification were best for all concerned before it should be acted upon. There may be gratification of the emotional nature without overstepping the limits prescribed by through inheritance or cultivation, seem to exhale perennial placidity, and to be incapable of even the mildest emotional transport. But the sea is never so grand or so majestic as in a storm, and the true man is never so great or so noble as when, in the full sway of the emotions, his whole nature is revealed, as a patriot, a poet, an orator, a lover, or a friend. And as there is a rhythm in the storm, so there is an undercurrent of superb self-control in the greatest emotional natures. Greater "is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

Miscellaneous Questions

Robin Culpepper, Va. Give the history of the problem of squaring the circle?

Efforts to solve the problem numerically were made by the ancient Jews, Babylonians and Chinese. The first attempt at geometrical solution was by the Greeks, Archimedes (287-212 B.C.), making the most notable advance. The Greek mathematician, Euclid (323-285 B.C.) laid down the principles upon which subsequent students have based their calculations. From those early times till now, eminent mathematicians have at various times struggled with the proposition, and many have gone mad over it. Among modern circle-quadratures, Hermite did good work. Lindman's demonstration, 1882, was up to that time the best, but like Hermite's, "left something to be desired." It has been classed with "perpetual motion" and other impossible things as an "unsolved and unsolvable problem."

J. M. T., Johnson, Vt. In view of the results produced by hypnotism and so-called mental healing, many claim that healing and other effects might be produced by any object, if one only had the requisite faith. The heathen have faith in their graven gods. Why doesn't their faith secure the performance of miracles?

The question is too broad. It involves "mental suggestion," a term applied by hypnotists and healers generally. The faith of the hypnotic subject and of the superstitious heathen has nothing in common with the faith of the Christian, and therefore cannot be employed as a standard of comparison.

R. T. R., Raymond, Calif. Such teaching is infidelity. Have nothing to do with it. It can only lead to sorrow and regret.

Rev. H. E. Probst, of Port Arthur, Ont., Can., can use good reading matter in his missionary work in the camps, mills and mines of that section.

Miss Georgia A., Pleasant Hope, Mo. An attachment would be issued on affidavit that the debtor was preparing to remove his goods out of the State.

Ella L. R., Cushman, Mass. The question you ask is one that should be decided by the individual conscience. There are many very good people who take a liberal view of such matters.

Mrs. F. Jamison, Galveston, Tex. The books you mention are apocryphal (or doubtful) writings, and were excluded from the Protestant Bible many generations ago by the church authorities.

Emotion the Soul's Speech

Emotion is the verity of the soul. The diffusion of faith, corresponding with the intensity of the things we love most. Reason alone never led a soul to Christ. Emotion, being the verity of the soul, is the master of the intellect. Intellect was man before he became a living soul. It mastered Joseph when he said, "I am Joseph." With Jacob it was unspeakable when he kissed Rachel at the well. It caused David to dance in the presence of the ark, Mary to wet Jesus' feet with tears, and Paul to pray near Damascus. After that he admonished every one night and day with tears. Jesus wept Gethsemane tears—our cup of joy.

J. FLORERFELT.

The Intellect both Master and Servant

The intellect should be both the master and servant of the emotions. It serves in the sense of guiding, directing and encouraging the emotional faculties while they are in a normal condition; but as a master it should check all excess and perversion of their use. In the well balanced mind, every emotion is under the guidance and restraint of right intellectual judgment. Without this control, not only the lower faculties, the animal appetites and passions, but the higher emotions, faith, hope, love, courage, benevolence and reverence, may become morbid and unhealthy in action. Emotion helped Paul to face the mob on the stairs at Antiochia, and Luther to burn the Pope's Bull at Wittenberg. It has subdued anarchy, freed slaves and founded republics. Parental love, unguided, often finds expression in harmful indulgence, and faith enlightened intellect and religious or moral sentiments. Such gratification may be the source of much enjoyment, and is not objectionable; but without a guiding influence, such as is to be found in the wisdom of intellect and the moral sense of right and wrong, the emotion may be indulged to excess. Every faculty of the human brain is good in itself, but all are liable to abuse. Their operations are right and proper only when they act in harmony one with another, enlightened intellect and moral sentiment holding the supremacy.

The Greatness of Self-Control

The emotions are the stronger, but, guided by the intellect, the two are in perfect equilibrium. Both are dominated, in the ultimate, by conscience or the moral sense. If intellect predominated, the heart would become hard, and the whole being would be unresponsive—a dry, animated, mathematical proposition; whereas if the emotions were unrestrained, the man would be less liable to become angelic than brutal. Emotion is a strong steed which, if guided aright, will bear us triumphantly and gloriously through the great crises of love, patriotism, sorrow, hope, faith and joy. In such experiences, unless the will guides the emotions as the steersman's lightest touch at the helm guides the ocean liner, they will sweep aside all barriers and revel in unrestrained riot. There are emotions, the normal indulgence of which operates harmoniously with the intellect, and lends dignity and sweetness to character; and on the other hand, there are natures which, either

The Blessing a Waif Brought

By Margaret E. Sangster

WHEN Marvin Ennis died, he left a large house, a good farm, and a tidy sum in bank, to be equally divided between his two girls, motherless from their early childhood. The will was very brief, and no directions were given as to the manner of dividing the property, though Squire Davidson, who knew the peculiarities of the Ennis people, pleaded for definite instructions when the will was drawn, to save future trouble, he said. The gray old father shook his head positively. "Let them settle it to suit themselves. I won't be above ground to bother with it."

Both daughters had ministered very tenderly to their father, though neither addressed a word to the other, unless it were absolutely necessary. They were twins, and forty years old, and the village had long since accepted them as they were, and had stopped speculating about them and their peculiarities.

Once or twice, while Marvin Ennis lay ill, he had fancied that he could bring about a reconciliation between them if he tried. He had always, however, had a man's instinctive dislike to a fuss, and a man's repulsion from scenes. To let things go had been the motto of his easy-going life, except in business, where he had been keen and able. It was a good inheritance he was leaving these girls. Girls they seemed to him as he lay on his bed, girls rosy, dimpled, sweet, as they had been when they first grew up, and he had taken pride in their beauty. Ah! if their mother had but lived to train these spoiled children. He would recall with a pang, and then would cease to think of interference, that they were forty years old, and the strife between them had lasted twenty of those years. The village of Upper Rockwell had grown accustomed to seeing the Ennis girls, as the two would continue to be called while they were spinsters, taking their part in church work and society as remote from each other as if they were not even acquaintances, the two never appearing at the same time, if it could be helped. When Sue came to church in the surrey, Jane walked, and vice versa. Unlike most twins, the sisters were opposites in looks and disposition. Sue was tall, dark and stately. Jane was short, plump and baby-faced, with golden hair, beginning to frost over in spots. Yet Jane was the more stubborn and the less amiable of the two. In her heart there was an incapacity for forgiveness that was like cold iron. She had never pardoned Sue for the defection of Abner Perkins, though Sue had been only a little to blame.

That, too, was an old story now. Abner Perkins had been engaged to Jane, and they were to have been married. So near had been the event that Jane's wedding dress was bought, and her underclothing, all lace-trimmed and embroidered, was laid away in the same trunk with the uncut white satin that was to have been the bride's gown. Sue divined by accident and intuition that Abner's heart was not filled by Jane. She saw that he had drifted into the engagement through proximity, and that he loved Carrie Means and Carrie loved him. Through Sue's tactful generalship, the engagement was broken, she saying, when her father remonstrated with her, "Let sleeping dogs lie; it isn't your affair." "Father, I cannot sit still and see three lives spoiled."

Abner married Carrie and went away, and was lost to sight in the West. Rumors floated back that he was poor, unsuccessful, ful, unhappy; then there came the tale of Carrie's death, then silence. Jane and Sue Ennis remained at home, alien and apart, and Marvin Ennis at last turned his face to the wall, and was gathered to his fathers.

Curiosity was soon satisfied as to what the Ennis girls would do. They literally divided the house perpendicularly. Sue set up housekeeping in solitude on the east side, and her friends used the side door. Jane's part was the west side, and her's was the front door. They had the farm worked on shares by a neighbor, and, as now, each lady had her own horse, her own cow, and her own chickens. They lived in entire independence, and did not quarrel—as how could they, having no occasion for speech? Besides, they had never had vulgar quarrels in words.

New Year's Day, this fifth year of the imperatively. "You were always clumsy with dolls. You don't know what a baby needs. I do."

Sue obeyed. She crossed the threshold of Jane's front door. She sat down in Jane's Boston rocker. She held the baby while Jane brought a basin, heated water for a bath, and milk to feed the child, and presently the little thing, warmed and fed, cooed, gurgled in baby contentment, and laughed aloud.

That baby laugh suddenly, melted the ice in both women's hearts. The farmer, coming in with Jane's brimming pail of milk, stared in open-eyed wonder at the amazing sight of the two, so long estranged, fondling a year-old baby, examining its clothing, forgetting their differences in a warm desire to do good to it. Why, it seemed to his dull comprehension as if, in the person of the little waif that had been baby no further," she said. She died that night.

The waif of New Year's morning was a bonny child, and the sisters called her Winifred, after their mother. Of her parentage they knew nothing, nor did they care from whom she came. Her mother had decent burial at their expense, and the divided house was turned into a single home again, while the twins made baby clothes and chatted as they had never done since Abner Perkins had been as a wedge to drive them apart.

Jane brought down her mother's old cradle from the garret and turned it into a nest for Winifred. Sue looked up her mother's receipt-books to discover delicacies that might please a child's palate. The child thrived on love. It had indeed brought a New Year's blessing with it into a house that had been starved for human affection and Christian forgiveness.

One evening, as the sisters sat amicably discussing plans and gossiping over their sewing, there came a rap at the door. Sue opened it.

A neighbor stood there with a shawl over her head. She had an air of bringing news, of subdued importance.

"Girls," she exclaimed, "Abner Perkins is back again. John Henry saw him last night. He looks just the same as ever, and I thought I'd put you on your guard. He may be coming here to call."

Jane's delicate face flushed, but Sue was equal to the emergency. "Why, of course," she answered. "You are very good, Mrs. Judson, but you need not have been disturbed. If Abner calls we'll be glad to see him."

Jane astonished both women by her words. The blush had left her cheek, and she gathered her courage in both hands.

"Yes, Mrs. Judson," she said. "Abner Perkins has come, because I sent for him. I had a letter from him from Arizona, three weeks ago. I sent him a telegraphic dispatch. Abner will be here to call this evening."

Something in her manner made Mrs. Judson feel de trop, though she was not ordinarily a sensitive person. She said good-night and went home. On the road she met Abner Perkins, stout, cheerful-looking, as sure of his welcome as if he had not caused a twenty-years' heartache, going back to find his second wife in his old sweetheart.

The marriage with Carrie Means had been a mistake. He had never ceased to love Jane Ennis, he declared, and there was a color of truth in the statement, for he had been a widower seven years. To come back in poverty went against his New England pride. He waited till his luck had turned, and he came back a rich man.

So the old satin was brought out, and its shining lengths were cut, and it made a beautiful wedding gown for Jane. And she and Abner went to their own house, leaving Sue to bring up the New Year's baby on the beautiful, big Ennis place. Winifred was the greatest comfort! Waif of the tempest of life, she was a flower of gracious girlhood, as like One who came before her, she grew in wisdom and in stature and in favor with God and man.

Never Disappointed

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—With many thanks for your kindness, I write to acknowledge the receipt of The Speaking Oak; it is a beautiful book and one I shall highly prize. I will not say it was better than I expected, for when looking for a premium offered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I know, from past experience, it is going to be a valuable gift, and have never been disappointed.

girls' living alone, was very cold and clear. Just as each woman in the early gray of the morning sat down to her solitary breakfast, a faint cry was heard outside. Jane thought it was a stray kitten, and hurried to find out. Cats were very precious in her eyes. Sue recognized a child's cry, and hurried out too. Both reached the baby at the same moment. It lay in the very front of the house, in the precise middle of the imaginary dividing line. Its head was toward Jane, its feet toward Sue. Both arrived at the spot at once, but it was Sue who caught the child, half-frozen as it was, and hugged it to her breast.

In her excitement, Jane forgot to be silent. "That's not fair," she said, "the child's head was on my side."

"I'm afraid it's going to have a fit," exclaimed Sue; "what shall I do?"

"Bring it right in here," replied Jane, left at their door in the cold and the snow, the Christ-Child had come and beaten down the bars of hatred in their hearts.

Indeed, for some time each had been silently wishing for a return of peace. Sue heard Jane cough in the night and longed to go in and give her a soothing draught. Jane saw Sue set off to the village and come back with parcels, and had a woman's wish to know what they were. The baby was left at just the right moment.

For some hours it did not occur to them to ask whose it was. But in the afternoon word came that a woman had been found dying by the wayside, near Holcomb's Woods, and she had said, as she was carried to the hospital, that she had left her child near a house a bit further back.

"I saw women there. I thought they would care for her, and I could carry my

Ten Thousand in a Bible Class

WHAT is probably the greatest Bible class in the world, meets weekly in four of the principal cities of America to study the Scriptures. In it are represented members of no less than 400 churches, including thirty different denominations. But one of the most interesting features of the gathering is that it is comprised largely of persons who, in the past, have not been connected with any church, and whose religious interest has been aroused through their class membership. The records for the past year show that from 2,000 to 2,500 people are present weekly, in one city alone—Chicago—and frequently the attendance is so large that it is necessary to hold special sessions for those who are unable to get into the halls where the class is convened.

Mr. William R. Newell, a devoted student of the Bible, was the originator of this truly remarkable assembly. During the Moody revival meetings in Chicago, Mr. Newell was a regular attendant and became acquainted with the evangelist, who requested him to form a Bible class. Mr. Newell readily assented, not conceiving that this was the inauguration of a movement of the greatest importance; but he was surprised to find 800 people gathered in response to the first invitation to join such a class. All pledged themselves, before being enrolled as members, to follow the teacher's instructions, and such was the enthusiasm that everyone kept the pledge, with the result that 500 persons in one week had read eleven chapters of the Bible no less than ten times!

Each member was requested to invite some friend to join the class, and in this way the membership swelled, until it assumed its present proportions. Such was the interest manifested throughout the country, that Mr. Newell found himself unable to confine his efforts to Chicago, and his assistants are giving instruction to an army of 10,000 people, many of whom have not before been interested in religious subjects or work.

The weekly schedule of visits to each city is arranged as follows: Monday is devoted to Detroit, Tuesday to Toronto, Friday to St. Louis, and Saturday to Chicago. Meeting places, which will accommodate the largest number, are selected regardless of their character. In Chicago, the auditorium of the Moody church, one of the largest in the country, is utilized. In Detroit, a military armory has been obtained, while music halls are the gathering places in Toronto and St. Louis. Beside the Bible class proper, auxiliary services are held, which are usually very well attended. One of the interesting features is a class lunch, which is paid for by voluntary contributions, the lunch offering being placed in a box at the door as the members enter. The whole amount received is then expended for a suitable bill of fare, and members of the class volunteer their services as waiters. The scene in Chicago, where sometimes 2,000 people take lunch together, is not only novel but interesting.

The official title of this remarkable organization is "The Union Bible Class." Mr. Newell's principal assistant is Mr. O. A. Miller, who has also attained considerable success as an instructor.

and, later, made arrangements to teach a class in St. Louis, which now numbers nearly 2,000. Next he was invited to the city of Detroit, where 1,500 people enrolled themselves. Perhaps the most remarkable result of his work has been in Toronto, where the meetings have been attended by 4,000 people a week, and it became necessary to provide two places in order to accommodate them. The classes in each city are considered merely as divisions, so that to-day Mr. Newell received is then expended for a suitable bill of fare, and members of the class volunteer their services as waiters. The scene in Chicago, where sometimes 2,000 people take lunch together, is not only novel but interesting.

we kept them we should have been like wolves ourselves.

"So, also, we should love the earth and not spoil it by digging it, ploughing it, and mining in it. Man should live in a warm country, where he can eat natural fruit. If one eats fruit, there is no need to work. Adam did not work. Christ is the second Adam, and men should leave their sins and return to the natural state of Adam before the Fall. Therefore we preach to men to leave off tilling the soil and to join us. It is the work of God to preach—a hundred times better than to work.

"We must give up using money, too. Jesus has said we cannot serve God and mammon, that we must render unto Caesar what is Caesar's—that is to say, all money; and to God what is God's, that is, our lives. If a man does not do this, he serves two masters and is against God.

"When we went out to walk and preach, we hoped that Jesus would help us and make it warm weather for us in the winter months. We thought that as God wills everything, this might be so. But if this was not to be, we could die for God. If I should go mad and freeze to death on purpose, my soul would go to hell; but to freeze for love of God—that would be good. But the government brought us back. I cannot say if that is from God or not. Perhaps. If the government stopped us and brought us back because they were afraid we would suffer, then I think it was from God; but if because they did not wish us to preach, then it was from the Evil One.

"What will we do when spring comes? I cannot say. Probably we will go walking again, taking our families with us—for what else can they do? If any man stays at home, he must live for himself, and not for God. He must have money, and that is greatly against God. But if a man will live for God, he must walk and preach.

"What do we preach? That men should give up meat and tobacco and whiskey. That God came, bringing us love and liberty, and we must fulfil his two commandments. We tell men they should set their cattle free, and give up iron and money and working, and come with us and walk. We preach the two commandments—that is all."

One thing that has struck me more forcibly than anything else, coming back to the Doukhobors after two years' absence, is that among the "Pilgrim" party there has occurred a complete change in their attitude towards the Bible. Before, whatever point of their practical faith one might touch on, they put their position before you on the ground of righteous reasonableness. Bibles are rare among Russian peasants, the Russian government not approving of their possessing them; and while a Doukhobor might quote a Biblical passage, or instance some Biblical story, there was none of that authoritative quoting of texts so conspicuous in the warfare of the sects. Now all is changed. Bibles in large numbers have been presented to them; missionaries speaking Russian have made propaganda among them, laying stress on the authority of the Bible, and supplying copies in Russian gratis, or very cheaply, and the "Pilgrim" Doukhobor, in discussion, will quote his favorite texts, or bring out his Bible and triumphantly point to some passage, as settling the matter beyond dispute.

I am bound, by the logic of the matter, to trace much of what has happened to the impact of the Bible, presented as an authority to be accepted blindly, on the minds of simple, illiterate, but intensely religious peasants.

Peter Verigin, the acknowledged leader of the Doukhobors, has been in exile in Siberia for sixteen years, and the news of his coming to Canada has been received with joy in all the Doukhobor villages. He is a man of great ability and force of character. He has before expressed himself in favor of the Doukhobors settling quietly down in their new homes and may therefore be expected to exert his influence with the people in that direction. It would seem reasonable to hope that the fierce outbreak of last October will not be repeated.

LAI'D TO REST BESIDE HER HUSBAND

WITH impressive ceremonial, Mrs. Julia Dent Grant, widow of General U. S. Grant, was committed to rest December 20, 1902, beside her dead husband in the Grant mausoleum, on Riverside Heights, New York. A sarcophagus, like his own, containing her remains, now occupies the vacant place, which has waited for her, who according to his wish, was not to be parted from him in death. There is deep and human as well national interest in the fact that, in this monument, built by a nation to its hero, the woman who faced the world at his side and shared his struggles, has equal place with the illustrious dead.

The programme arranged for the obsequies included a brief service at Mrs. Grant's Washington residence and a public service at the Metropolitan M. E. Church, Rev. Frank Bristol conducting, prior to the departure of the body to this city, where it was received by a guard of honor from the U. S. Grant Post, G. A. R., under whose escort it was borne to the Tomb, and there quietly placed in the sarcophagus. Sunday morning the committal service was held, Bishop Andrews, of the

M. E. Church, and Bishop Mackay-Smith, of the Protestant Episcopal, conducting, in the presence of the Grant family and a distinguished company representing our national, State and municipal governments, the Army, Navy and various judicial departments. As the space in the Tomb is limited, admission was by special invitation. The list of those whose presence was especially requested, included President Roosevelt, ex-President Cleveland, Governor Odell, Mayor Low, presidents of Columbia and New York Universities, Bishop Potter, Archbishop Farley, Gen. John B. Gordon, Commander of the Confederate Veterans, and Gens. Joe Wheeler and Fitzhugh Lee, representatives of the G. A. R., Loyal Legion, Society of the Potomac, Armies of the Tennessee and Cumberland, and trustees of the Grant Monument Association. The President, who attended the Washington funeral, regretted his inability to be present at the interment.

For the Parlor Table

"The Story of the Hall of Fame, like all of Dr. Louis Albert Banks' books, is all right," writes Mr. J. James Burwell, Homewood, Pa. "Dr. Klopsch publishes it in such beautiful form that its dress, as well as its contents, render it a fine ornament for the parlor table and a pleasing handbook for historical student and casual reader alike."

WHAT CAN WE ASK OF THE NEW YEAR?

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON

WHAT have we that is new for the New Year? Well, the new day, first to fall: that is, twelve golden hours set about with sixty jeweled minutes—seven hundred and twenty jewels in all.

Suppose half the jewels are under the shadow of our pain or our work, there are left three hundred and sixty, each one of which we may set around with a thought. That thought may be laden with such kindness or love or truth or beauty or patience sweetness and endurance as shall make it a glistening and glorious thing—like a star moving on to take its place in the heavens.

These moments are our greatest treasure. There is no gift like time; and when we multiply one day by the glad hope of many days, all of which we can brighten for somebody, why, the New Year has given us that hope. And that gift of hope is enough to gladden our lives.

And what, besides moments and hopes does the New Year bring? Opportunities for service. "Ah, but mine are so small," I hear you say. What matter? Do you remember St. Christopher, who sought the wide world over to find not a great service, but a great Master.

And finding the Greatest Master, no service seemed small to be performed for Him.

Now what more can we ask of the New Year? Time, hope, opportunity; are they not enough? And yet beside these, the new year brings the fact that so many of those we love are with us still; that home and food and clothing and all the many little needs of life are not beyond our reach; that there are new books in the world to read; new people to know and love; that God's winter is going surely to be followed by spring, and again we are to see blossoms and leaves upon the trees; that the old things are passing away, and that all things shall become new.

What are some of the old things? A little lingering selfishness, a little pride, a little unwillingness to accept our own burdens, a little sadness, and bitterness, and unrest. Thank God these are among the old things! His touch upon the life can make them new.

Perhaps there are no people in the world who really welcome the New Year with more pleasure than do these weary with care. If life is too heavily burdened with work or suffering, then we are glad because it has gone. If life holds the hope of better things in the future, then we are grateful that another year is given us in which to realize the hope. Out of the bitterness and suffering we come as the always gay people do not, to realize the blessedness of every little pleasure, and the comfort of every little joy. To get any light at all we are forced to keep our soul windows "open to the sun."

You remember, Whittier says:

The windows of my soul I throw Wide open to the sun.

Failing to do that, we shall find it easy to dwell in the shadows; doing that, our faces will be turned day by day, and hour by hour toward the light. And "in His light, we shall see light."

With the other new things, does the New Year bring new labors, new hurts, new sorrows? These, too, are only a part of the "all things" that are working together for our good. They are not our affair anyway, but His. His servants, these "all things." It is He who is keeping them busy, keeping them at work "together." They "work together for good to them that love God." The loving God is our part of the process; the trial and pain that are to work out our good are His to carry for us. All of which being true, is there any reason why we should not with hope and courage cross the threshold and enter upon a glad New Year?

Old sorrows that sat at the heart's sealed gate,
Like sentinels grim and sad,
While out in the night-damp, weary and late,
The King, with a gift divinely great,
Waited to make me glad.

Old fears that hung like a changing cloud,
Over a sunless day,
Old burdens that kept the spirit bowed,
Old wrongs that rankled or clamored loud—
They have passed like a dream away.

In the world without and the world within,
He maketh the old things new;
The touch of sorrow, the stain of sin,
Have fled from the gate where the King came in,
From the chill night's damp and dew.

Anew in the heavens the sweet stars shine,
On earth new blossoms spring,
The old life list in the life divine,
My will is Thine, Thy will be mine,
The song which the new hearts sing.

Found Christ in a Prison Cell

BY CHAPLAIN M'NRO

IN the fall of 1888, a young lad, a native of the Pine Tree State, shipped from Portland, Me., as a cabin boy on a whaler. The voyage lasted six months. For fourteen years, according to this sailor's testimony, he has lived a wild, drunken life. Cutting himself off from God and home and friends, he has been in every part of the world, and has been several times shipwrecked. On such occasions he has sworn that if God would spare his life to reach his native shore, he would become a Christian. His promises were soon forgotten. He went deeper into lies after every voyage. Between five and six weeks ago, he was arrested and cast into prison in New York, where he had an opportunity to think over his past life. When he came to himself, like the prodigal, he began to pray in his dark cell—something he had not done since he was a boy. God heard his cry, and he found peace through the blood of Jesus. He soon became a happy Christian; his face was full of sunshine. A wonderful change had come over him. About a week ago, a jury found that he was innocent and the judge set him free. Now he praises God for being in prison, for it was there he found the Lord Jesus. Before going out he wrote me:

Dear Chaplain:—After attending your services I got down on my knees and asked God to change my wicked heart, and he did. He has made all things new in my case and I give him all the praise.

This is the kind of work that is being done in the Tombs Prison. The work is unsectarian. The Gospel Mission to the Tombs is endeavoring to raise two thousand dollars for its work during the coming year. There is no religious work that appeals more directly to the sympathy of all who are interested in the unfortunate and criminal. The treasurer of the Mission is Mr. George E. Sterry, 79 Pine street, New York.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Uncle Sam and Cuba*

IN Uncle Sam, Trustee, you will find an admirable presentation of the work which has been accomplished by the United States in giving Cuba a new start in her national life. It was a herculean task which General Wood and his associates undertook, and as the reader begins to appreciate the conditions that prevailed at the beginning of the American occupation, he may well become proud as he compares with them the conditions which prevailed when the reins of government finally passed into Cuban hands.

To give one example, when Gen. Wood assumed office there were no public schools in Cuba; before the end of 1900 there were 3,313 schools in active operation, with 143,000 pupils enrolled. And so it was in all departments. Besides the Department of Public Instruction, he had to build practically from the ground up a Department of Public Works, a Department of Charities and Correction, a Department of Sanitation, to say nothing of reorganizing the Custom House, the Post-office, the Police, and establishing the much needed system for the administration of justice. At the time of the American occupation many of the city parks were fenced in, and the gardeners in charge used this ground for raising vegetables. In the hospitals, if the sick could get medicine and food, they did so themselves. Sometimes they were helped to these things by another sick person in the same ward, who could crawl out of his bed and help a less fortunate companion. In speaking of smuggling practices, the author relates an amusing story of a negro expert who found employment at the time when there was a big differential duty against American flour. Spanish and American flour were interchanged on the dock, for the purpose of avoiding duties, by the simple process of changing the labels. The change of the label was brought about by this expert, who had the proper brand on the seat of his trousers, and entertained the appraisers by cleverly sitting the brands on the sacks on the open dock.

Some idea of the standards of personal cleanliness that prevailed in Havana in the old days may be had, when it is remembered that General Wheeler himself, as a mark of special distinction to a guest, was wont to take him confidently aside, and show him the newly installed bathtub in the palace, as one of the chief objects of interest in Havana.

"Uncle Peter"†

TO pass an idle day with "The Spenders" is no small enjoyment. They are not all admirable characters, but if they were, "Uncle Peter" would have had no mission in life. As it is, he has a good deal to do, and his methods, like himself, are the more charming for being delightfully unconventional. Here is a character we can picture linking arms with dear old David Harum and Eben Holden.

He is a Westerner, and he loves the West. The wealth he has amassed brings him no pleasure when he goes East. He became restless, discontented, and, at last, unmistakably miserable.

"It can't be because I'm rich," he argued, "it's a sure thing my money can't keep me from doin' jest what I want to."

His triumphant finale was: "When you come to think about it, a rich man ain't really got any more excuse for bein' mis'able than a poor man has."

"I reckon you'll find," he says, in another of his philosophic moods, "that the proportion of happy rich to unhappy rich is a mighty sight smaller than the proportion of happy poor to unhappy poor. I'm one of the former minority, all right; but it's because I know how to be rich and still enjoy all the little comforts of poverty."

The character-drawing throughout the book is masterly, but Peter Bines deserves a slab in the literary Hall of Fame. He stands for the West and the men who have made their money there, and have no wish to spend it in the East. His grandson, Percival, stands for the East, and the younger generation who, having inherited their wealth, do not care where it was made—are concerned only in the spending of it. Uncle Peter sets out to reform his grandson, and there is no fault to be found with the way he does it. The love affair, which forms an undercurrent of interest throughout the story, ends with a climax that is daringly original.

Uncle Sam*, Reggs Publishing Co., New York. Price $1.75.

†The Spenders, by Harry Leon Wilson. Lothrop Publishing Co. $1.50.

How to Frame Your "Art Gallery"

So many readers have written us asking how they should frame the Art Gallery collection, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD submits below the opinions of some of the leading art framers in New York City, on the subject. Any of the methods described here, all of which are inexpensive, will give satisfactory results.

Use a flat, black, oak frame, one and one-quarter inches wide, close to the picture, without any mat, except for the oval pictures, which require a mat. We would suggest a gray, buff, or a color corresponding to some of the darker tones in the pictures. If you wish variety in your frames, you can, with good taste, select light brown for the lighter subjects, and a greenish and black oak for the darker ones.

Another way to secure good results is to use a gold frame, from one inch to one and one-quarter inches wide, on any or all of the pictures. The same suggestion applies to the oval pictures.

The average cost of oak frames, in any color, will be about fifty cents each. Gold frames can be had from fifty cents to one dollar each, according to width and quality of moulding selected.

A plain, flat moulding (which you can procure from any carpenter or moulding shop) and which you can stain to any desired color, would be the most economical way of framing the pictures, and might be made to look very well indeed. In the large cities, the frames can be bought ready made from the department stores or frame-makers for so little money that it would not be an object to frame them yourself.

while, desiring to set England right in American eyes, Lord Lansdowne, the Foreign Minister, announced in Parliament that no foreign territory would be seized, and that Britain would not take any steps to antagonize the United States or disturb existing relations. Germany maintained a policy of silence as to her future intentions.

On December 18, the strain of the situation was greatly relieved by the announcement that President Castro, yielding to the entreaties of the leading merchants and others in Caracas, had consented to arbitration, and had formally requested U. S. Minister Bowen to act as arbitrator in behalf of Venezuela. This was quickly followed by the news that England and Germany were both agreeable to arbitrate, and had intimated a desire to have President Roosevelt act as arbitrator instead of referring to the Hague tribunal. The danger point was apparently safely passed, and the moral effect of the firm and dignified attitude of the United States throughout had resulted in averting actual war, and in a recognition of the Monroe Doctrine at the last moment.

QUAINT PSALMS for QUEER FOLK

BY REV. C. H. YATMAN

PSALM 45 The Women's Psalm

7. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

"KINGS' DAUGHTERS"

8. All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

9. Kings' daughters were among thy honorable women.

10. Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house;

11. So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty: for he is thy Lord; and worship thou him.

The Psalmist's pen runs readily here.

Next to God's good grace in this world, come God's good women. Her photograph is perfect in Psalm 45. This should be called the "Kings' Daughters' Psalm." Its truth will make a princess of any lassie, a queen of any woman. And for a crown, the fulfillment of verse 16, will outshine, outweigh and outlast the jewels of all kings and queens. Here is where the woman of lowly birth may taste the sweets of true royalty.

PSALM 46 The Refuge Psalm

1. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

"THE WATERS ROAR"

2. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

3. Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah.

"Martin Luther's Psalm" is a more fitting name. The Reformation came out of Luther's life, because this Psalm went in him. Genesis 32 must be read to understand it aright. It is a Psalm like this that draws and drives men to prevailing prayer. Little Christians would be drowned in crossing a stream of truth this size. Earthquakes and floods, with whole kingdoms shaken, are minor matters to one who grasps this.

PSALM 47 Cheerful Folks' Psalm

1. O clap your hands, all ye people: shout unto God with the voice of triumph.

"CLAP YOUR HANDS"

6. Sing praises to God, sing praises: sing praises unto our King.

7. For God is the King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding.

"Clap your hands"—"Shout unto God"—"Sing praises." I wish we had more "sons of Korah." Cheerful people are like the birds and flowers and songs of the earth, we can never have too many of them. A Psalm like this is death to the blues. It is like sunshine after rain. After reading verse 6, you feel like calling it the "Singing Psalm."

PSALM 48 Church Members' Psalm

12. Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof.

"MARK HER TOWERS"

13. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following.

14. For this God is our God for ever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death.

A stranger to Zion, a sinner outside the church, will find himself in queer company with these fourteen verses; the last one would overwhelm him with confusion. He would have to read it, "For this God is not my God," "I have refused his guidance even unto death." But, to the member of the church who lives in communion with Christ will come with force, thoughts of God's loving kindness, in the midst of his temple.

SAVE TO SERVE*

The Duty of Every Believer to Bring Others to Christ

One of the most significant passages in all the Gospels is the incident related by Mark, which is associated with the Topic. The poor man, just delivered from the fearful aberration, described as possession by the devil, finds Christ, and beseeches to be allowed to accompany him. We can imagine his state of mind. He knows from what he has been delivered, and he cannot be sure that his affliction will not return upon him. That was certain to be his great dread. What protection could he have, better than to be near Him who had delivered him? Instead of consenting, Christ sends him away on a mission. Having been delivered himself, the man should work for the deliverance of others. There are higher considerations than even his own safety. Perhaps, Christ saw that the duty imposed on him, was the best means of insuring his safety. In declaring his redemption and applauding his Deliverer, he would probably grow in grace and faith, better than in listening to Christ's words and seeing his miracles. A great teacher was accustomed to set the boys, who were learning Latin in his school, to teach the boys who were beginning the study. He used to contend that the practice was beneficial, because it grounded the rudiments in the boys' minds.

How much the Temperance cause owes to that principle! There have been no advocates of it so successful as those who have themselves been delivered from the drink curse! If Gough had been so concerned about his own safety that he hid himself in a Temperance Society, and associated only with total abstainers, how many poor drunkards, whom his eloquence delivered, would have been left in bondage! He had a sympathy with them that could be felt by no man who had led a sober life from boyhood. He could tell them out of his own experience the way to emancipation. He could encourage them by his example. He was not only specially qualified for his work, not only under imperative obligation to undertake it, but in prosecuting it was gaining moral power. It is so in religion. The Christ-life in the soul thrives best when the believer is actively engaged in soul winning. The doubts, the self-introspection, the depression of spirit disappear when the attention is turned outward to the rescue of other people. The man who is busy in applying to others the remedy for sin, who is pointing the victims of sin to the Cross, sees its efficacy so clearly proved that he can have no doubts on his own account, and goes forth to meet his own temptations, strong in the faith.

It is thus that Christianity has won its triumphs, and to this work it must look for future success. People are not converted in mass. There are times when, under powerful preaching, large numbers are brought into the Kingdom at the same time; but every conversion is an individual change. Some one soul presents to some other soul the key to the changed life. Too much dependence ought not to be put upon preaching and preachers. Though it still pleases God by "the foolishness of preaching" to save souls, every believer ought to be working to the same end. If he cannot preach, he can teach in a Sunday School; he can speak to his associates and friends. His testimony may be all the more effective on account of his not being a professional advocate. His disinterested motives will be appreciated, and his recommendation will have the force of a concrete example. As a consumptive patient who has been cured by a special course of treatment, would urge it upon a friend who has been smitten with the same disease and would plead with him to follow the same course, pointing to his own recovery in proof of its efficacy, so the sinner, redeemed by Christ's power, is under a solemn obligation to make known his redemption and to bring all whom he can influence to the same spiritual healer.

OUR SUNDAY HOUR

WITH THE LITTLE FOLKS

SCRIPTURE PROBLEM NO. 4

This picture illustrates a scene in the Old Testament. Write a description of it not more than twenty words in length. First, read the rules carefully WELCOME, children, to our "Sunday Hour!" "You ought to call it our 'Sunny Hour,'" writes one little friend.

Our congregation is very large now, judging from the avalanche of letters pouring into this department. Let it grow! We are glad to greet every one of you. Come every week and bring your friends.

Let us remind you that answers to last week's competition must be in not later than January 7; send earlier if you can. Beginning with this week's issue, answers must be mailed not later than the Monday following date of publication of competitions. We are giving your letters careful attention. It appears that a great many of our "Sunday Hour" children want watches. So, again we offer a handsome silver watch, lady's or gentleman's, as the first prize in both of this week's competitions. We give one hundred beautiful books to those who send the next best answers.

Competition No. 1 Scripture Problem No. 4

The picture represents an event recorded in Judges, Samuel, Kings or Chronicles. Write, in your own language, a description, using not more than twenty words.

Competition No. 2. Curious Questions

1. In connection with what great event did Moses appoint the first month of the Hebrew year?
2. What names or terms of description were applied to the Jewish New Year?
3. What was the chief feature of its celebration as described in the Old Testament?
4. What form of benediction was pronounced by Aaron and his sons on Israel's congregations?

Beginning with next week, we shall publish a number of pictorial puzzles quite different from any which have already appeared, for the correct solution of which many useful rewards will be distributed. Full explanations will be contained in our issue of January 7, so we advise our little readers to be on the lookout for that number, which will also publish names of prize-winners to the competitions that appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 10, 1902.

No competitor shall be over fourteen years of age. A reader may enter one or more competitions. They are quite distinct. But no reader may send in more than one attempt for each competition. There is no rule against asking the help of others, but each competitor must send in the answers in his or her own handwriting.

In Competition No. 1, the answer must be written on a postal card, or on one side of a sheet of paper. The name, age and address of each competitor must be clearly written at the top.

In Competition No. 2, the competitor must answer as many of the questions as possible. The name, age and address must be written at the top of the first sheet of paper, and all the sheets must be numbered. The writing must be on only one side of each sheet of paper. Answers to all four questions must not be more than one hundred words included.

Competition No. 1. The prize for the best description of the picture will be a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. To the fifty readers sending the next best answers, we will give a beautiful book, bound in rich white velum, with holly decorations in green, red and gold.

Competition No. 2. To the reader who sends in the best answers to the greatest number of questions, we will send a handsome silver watch, either lady's or gentleman's. Fifty consolation prizes of the beautiful book mentioned above will also be awarded.

All answers must be mailed not later than January 5, 1903.

SPRIT-FILLED LIFE

Paul's Power to Bless, the Result of Being Blessed

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

A MAN who is filled with the Holy Ghost, and in whom the Holy Ghost is as "a well of water springing up unto eternal life" (John 4: 14), cannot be under the power of his surroundings. The exalted Christ, the God-man, is seated at God's right hand in the heavens, far above all that is in this age or in the age to come, and God has put all things in subjection under his feet (Eph. 1: 20-22), and he has saved his own people and raised them up to sit with Christ, also far above. The same Paul who wrote to the Ephesians, when, in the prison at Philippi, was "far above" his own wrongs and sufferings, occupied with practical love to his enemy the jailer. He had then been imprisoned only for a few hours. Would the same grace of God bear the strain of a long imprisonment? We find the same man, still filled with the Holy Ghost, writing from his prison in Rome, where his incarceration was not hours long, but weeks, months, years. And the first words of his epistle after his greeting are words of thanksgiving! No repining, no blaming others, no impatience; he had learned what he had taught—that "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8: 28).

Writing to his beloved Philippian converts, naming first the "saints" and afterwards "the bishops and deacons," he, who was lifted above all by the grace and peace of his God, says with all the authority of one who believes what he says, "Grace be to you and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." Blest himself in the midst of suffering, he could send forth, as God's servant, blessing to others also. Paul was at home everywhere, because the Holy Spirit, who was within him as the Spirit of truth, led him into the true meaning of all the circumstances in which he was placed. Nothing could come amiss to him. Instead of regretting this, trying to prevent that, fearing another thing, he believed in the wisdom of God, at whatever cost to himself, and took all things from his hand.

Thus free from the care of his own interests, the apostle wrote without any preoccupation of heart, and his spirit was full of praise. This is the essence of a truly Christian life. A spirit which does not habitually praise God is not habitually in communion with him. What a cheer it must have been to his spiritual children at Philippi, to Lydia and her family, to the jailer and his family, to the once possessed girl, when Paul wrote them: "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you!" And when he added "always, in every supplication of mine for you all, making request with joy, for your fellowship in furtherance of the Gospel from the first day until now." Paul prayed for them, and thus stood with them before God. While away in prison he was helping them forward by pleading with God for them, and it was a joy to him to pray for them. This must indeed have been encouraging to this infant church.

The apostle prized their "fellowship in furtherance of the Gospel." In what did this consist? They prayed for him; he writes them of trials which he had through those who supposed to add affliction to his bonds, and says, "I know that this shall turn to my salvation, through your prayer, and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1: 15-19). He prayed for them; they prayed for him. It was a precious fellowship, and in this way Paul furthered the Gospel in Philippi and the Philippians the Gospel in Rome. Prayer is a deep reality. God "worketh for him that waiteth for him" (Isa. 44: 4, R.V.). We ask, he works. "Ye shall ask, I will do" (John 14: 14). Again they had fellowship with him in suffering. God showed Paul how great things he must suffer for his sake (Acts 9: 16); and to the Philippians it was given, on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for his sake, so that they had the same conflict which they saw in him (Phil. 1: 29, 30). Then they ministered to his needs—"The abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality" (2 Cor. 8: 1, 2; Phil. 4: 14-18). In all these things they exemplified true Christian living.

Paul must speak confidently "of this very thing, that he which began a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ" (ver. 6, R.V.). What a strength this must have been to the early church of Philippi! God would not withdraw his hand from those who were his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works (Eph. 2: 10). We also may count on the faithfulness of our God: we may fail him in many ways, but he will never fail us. In all in which we do not hinder him by unbelief and disobedience, he will accomplish that which he has begun. The apostle gives his reason for this confidence. "It is right for me to be thus minded on behalf of you all, because I have you in my heart" (or "ye have me in your heart"; probably both readings are true).

YOU CAN MAKE $5,000 FOR $6. A MONTH TILL YOU'VE PAID $510

WE put the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one, to induce every reader of The Christian Herald to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which will actually give you $5,000 in return for your investing $10 down and $6 a month until you have paid $510. There are certainly 100,000 of The Christian Herald readers who could invest and would invest if the Secretary of the United States Treasury made the above statement instead of a private corporation, and yet the private corporation in this instance may be just as capable and just as reliable as the Secretary of the Treasury. We know we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the fact to you.

$500 invested for a child will put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple will come close to making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them five times better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

4,000 Investors Bought $3,461,000 Worth of our New York Lots During the Past Year

Nearly three and a half million dollars!—that's the forceful story of our real estate sales during the year just ended. We ask you to dwell on these figures long enough to realize—to understand what they really mean. These three and a half million dollars actually represent the confidence which the thousands who have invested in our New York City lots have in us. You, perhaps, have not yet invested—not even investigated our wonderful proposition:—

“$10 Secures a $510 Lot in Greater New York”

COPYRIGHT, 1901, UNDERHILL

Within 35 Minutes of These Skyscrapers, by Trolley, 5c.

This is a high class and strictly honest proposition, or you may be sure The Christian Herald would not permit its announcement to appear. Nor would we have the privilege of referring to twenty odd National Banks, the Commercial Agencies, and over 30,000 customers across the United States.

Doesn't it seem fair to presume that the same reasons which convinced so many thousands of practical thinking men and women everywhere of the undoubted value of our proposition, would convince YOU? Isn't it worth the time at least to send us your name to-day—and learn how you may make $5,000 by paying $10 down and $6 a month until your payments amount to $510?

This may sound extravagant—yet every statement we make is based upon a fact. It is in evidence—it can be verified—it can be SEEN. Naturally we will be accused of being biased in our opinions—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION AND ADVICE
World's Greatest Investors and Financiers RUSSELL SAGE

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

“I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

“Young man, buy real estate, especially acre property, in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable.” RUSSELL SAGE.

Our property is located in Brooklyn—it is therefore a very significant fact when Mr. Sage says “Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.” Think of it! That means three-fourths of all of New York's enormous yearly increased population.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or, in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round-trip Chicago ticket.

25% GUARANTEED INCREASE

For $10 down and $6 per month until paid, we sell you a regular New York City lot, full size, subject to the following guarantees from us. If, at the expiration of the year 1903, this $510 lot is not worth $638—or 25 per cent. increase—on the price at which our corps of salesmen will then be selling similar lots, we will refund the money you have paid us, with 6 per cent. interest additional. If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land.

“There is no doubt the property offered by Wood, Harmon & Co., in the 20th and 3rd Wards, represents one of the best investments a man of limited income can possibly make within the corporate limits of Greater New York. It can be said without hesitancy that Wood, Harmon & Co. are perfectly reliable, and are worthy the fullest confidence of the investor, whether he resides in Greater New York or any other section of the United States.”

THE NASSAU NATIONAL BANK OF BROOKLYN.

We feel that we are the trustees of the thousands who invest with us and as such we shall see that every dollar YOU invest with us shall bring you many fold. You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars, or better still—mail us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that we must return it to you if we have misrepresented our proposition in the slightest particular. Write under all circumstances. You would not be fair to yourself if you failed to look into this matter. Fill out the coupon and mail it to us to-day.
